

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. KEY TO THE PRONUNCIATION AND TO THE ABBREVIATIONS AND SIGNS EMPLOYED.

PRONUNCIATION.

IN showing the pronunciation the simplest and most easily understood method has been adopted, that of re-writing the word in a different form. In doing so the same letter or combination of letters is made use of for the same sound, no matter by what letter or letters the sound may be expressed in the principal word. The key by this means is greatly simplified, the reader having only to bear in mind one mark for each sound.

Vowels.

a, as in fate	o, as in not.
ā, " far.	ō, " move.
ā, " fat.	ū, " tube.
ā, " fall.	u, " tub.
ē, " me.	ū, " bull.
e, " met.	ū, " Sc. abune (Fr. u).
ē, " her.	oi, " oil.
i, " pine.	ou, " pound.
i, " pin.	y, " Sc. fey (=e+i).
ō, " note.

Consonants.

ch, as in chain.	th, as in then.
ch, " Sc. loch, Ger. nach.	th, " thin.
j, " job.	w, " wig.
g, " go.	wh, " whig.
h, " Fr. ton.	zh, " azure.
ng, " sing.

The application of this key to the pronunciation of foreign words can as a rule only represent approximately the true pronunciation of those words. It is applicable, however, to Latin and Greek words, as those languages are pronounced in England.

Accent.—Words consisting of more than one syllable receive an accent, as the first syllable of the word labour, the second of delay, and the third of comprehension. The accented syllable is the most prominent part of the word, being made so by means of the accent. In this dictionary it is denoted by the mark '. This mark, called an accent, is placed above and beyond the syllable which receives the accent, as in the words la'bour, de'lay, and compre'hension.

Many polysyllabic words are pronounced with two accents, the primary and the secondary accent, as the word excommunication, in which the third, as well as the fifth syllable is commonly accented. The accent on the fifth syllable is the primary, true, or tonic accent, while that on the third is a mere euphonic accent, and consists of a slight resting on the syllable to prevent indistinctness in the utterance of so many unaccented syllables. Where both accents are marked in a word, the primary accent is thus marked ", and the secondary, or inferior one, by this mark ', as in the word excommuni'cation.

CHEMICAL ELEMENTS AND SYMBOLS.

By means of chemical symbols, or formulas, the composition of the most complicated substances can be very easily expressed, and that, too, in a very small compass. An abbreviated expression of this kind often gives, in a single line, more information as to details than could be given in many lines of letterpress.

Elements.	Symbols.	Elements.	Symbols.
Aluminium,	Al	Mercury (Hydrargyrum),	Hg
Antimony (Stibium),	Sb	Molybdenum,	Mo
Arsenic,	As	Nickel,	Ni
Barium,	Ba	Niobium,	Nb
Bismuth,	Bi	Nitrogen,	N
Boron,	B	Osmium,	Os
Bromine,	Br	Oxygen,	O
Cadmium,	Cd	Palladium,	Pd
Cæsium,	Cs	Phosphorus,	P
Calcium,	Ca	Platinum,	Pt
Carbon,	C	Potassium (Kallium),	K

Lead (Plumbum),	Pb	Vanadium,	V
Lithium,	L	Yttrium,	Y
Magnesium,	Mg	Zinc,	Zn
Manganese,	Mn	Zirconium,	Zr

When any of the above symbols stands by itself it indicates one atom of the element it represents. Thus, H stands for one atom of hydrogen, O for one atom of oxygen, and Cl for one atom of chlorine. (See ATOM, and Atomic theory under ATOMIC, in Dictionary.)

When a symbol has a small figure or number underwritten, and to the right of it, such figure or number indicates the number of atoms of the element. Thus—O₂ signifies two atoms of oxygen, S₅ five atoms of sulphur, and C₁₀ ten atoms of carbon.

When two or more elements are united to form a chemical compound, their symbols are written one after the other, to indicate the compound. Thus—H₂O means water, a compound of two atoms of hydrogen and one of oxygen; C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁ indicates cane-sugar, a compound of twelve atoms of carbon, twenty-two of hydrogen, and eleven of oxygen.

These two expressions as they stand denote respectively a molecule of the substance they represent, that is, the smallest possible quantity of it capable of existing in the free state. To express several molecules a large figure is prefixed, thus: 2 H₂O represents two molecules of water, 4(C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁) four molecules of cane-sugar.

When a compound is formed of two or more compounds the symbolical expressions for the compound are usually connected together by a comma; thus, the crystallized magnesian sulphate is MgSO₄, 7 H₂O. The symbols may also be used to express the changes which occur during chemical action, and they are then written in the form of an equation, of which one side represents the substances as they exist before the change, the other the result of the reaction. Thus, 2 H₂ + O₂ = 2 H₂O expresses the fact that two molecules of hydrogen, each containing two atoms, and one of oxygen, also containing two atoms, combine to give two molecules of water, each of them containing two atoms of hydrogen and one of oxygen.

THE IMPERIAL DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

L

L, the twelfth letter of the English alphabet, is usually denominated a semi-vowel or a liquid. It is formed by placing the tip of the tongue against the gum that incloses the roots of the upper teeth, and allowing the breath to escape by the sides of the tongue. L has only one sound in English, as in like, canal. At the end of monosyllables it is often doubled, as in fall, full, tell, bell, but not after diphthongs and digraphs, as soul, fool, provel, groul, foal, &c. The nearest ally of l is r, the pronunciation of which differs from that of l only in being accompanied by a vibration of the tip of the tongue. There is no letter accordingly with which l is more frequently interchanged, instances of the change of l into r and of r into l being both very common in various languages. In fact in the history of the Indo-European alphabet l is considered to be a later modification of r. Thus the Skr. ruch, to shine, corresponds to the Gr. root luk in leukos, white, L. luc in lucce, to shine, luz, light, and the root of E. light; the L. ulmus yields the Fr. orme, and the L. peregrinus yields the It. pellegrino, Fr. pèlerin, E. pilgrim, L. lavendula, E. lavender. So too the Latin adjectival terminations -alis, -aris are the same. There are whole nations that do not possess one or other of these sounds, the Japanese, for example, always using r instead of l, while the Chinese use l instead of r. L is also found representing n, as in postern, as well as the mutes d, t, thus E. tear, Fr. larme, Gr. dakry, are etymologically the same words. In A. Sax. l, like the other liquids n and r, is often preceded by h, which was no doubt sounded, as in hlaf, loaf; hladan, to lade or load; hlót, lot; hlinsian, hlomsian, to lean. In English words the terminating syllable le is unaccented, the e is silent, and l forms itself a syllable, as in able, eagle, pronounced abl, eagl. In some words l is now mute, as in half, calf, walk, chalk, yolk, calm; from others it has disappeared altogether, as from each, ruch; in hawberk, auburn, it has become u; in could, syllable, participle, it has intruded. — As an abbreviation, in Latin, it stands for Lucius; L.L.S. for a sesterce, or two libras and a half. L.L.D. stands for Legum Doctor, Doctor of Laws. L is also used for liber, book, as applied to a division in a work. — As a numeral L stands for 50.

La, (la), exclaim. [A. Sax. la, lo! behold!] Look; see; behold.

La, (la). In music, (a) in solmization, the sixth of the seven syllables—ut or do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, si—representing the seven sounds in the diatonic scale. (b) The syllable by which Guido denoted the last sound of each of his hexachords. If the hexachord begins in C, the la answers to our A; if in G, to our E; and if in F, to D.

Lab, Labbe, n. [Allied to D. labben, to blab, to tell tales; to G. labbe, lip, mouth; and probably to E. blab.] A great talker; a blabber. 'I am no lab.' Chaucer. [Obsolete or provincial.]

Lab, Labbe, v. i. [See the noun.] To blab; to prate; to talk thoughtlessly or carelessly. 'A labbing shrew is she.' Chaucer.

Labadist (lab'a-dist), n. A follower of Jean de Labadie, who lived in the seventeenth century. The Labadists held that God can and does deceive men, that the observance of the Sabbath is a matter of indifference, and other peculiar opinions.

Labarri (la-bar'ri), n. Elaps lemniscatus, a deadly snake of Guiana, which sometimes reaches the length of 8 feet. It is beautifully coloured when alive, but fades when dead.

Labarum (lab'a-rum), n. [L. labarum, labōrum, Gr. labaron, labōron; etym. doubtful.] The imperial standard adopted by Constantine the Great after his conversion to Christianity, differently described and figured, but generally represented as a pole having a cross-bar with the banner depending from it and bearing the Greek letters X P (that is, Chr), conjoined so as to form a monogram of the name of Christ. The banner was made of silk. The word is sometimes used for any other standard or flag, and its form may still be recognized in the banners carried in ecclesiastical processions in all Roman Catholic countries.

Labdanum (lab'da-num). See LADANUM.

Labefaction (lab-e-fak'shon), n. [L. labefactio, from labefacio—labo, to totter, and facio, to make.] A weakening or loosening; a falling; decay; downfall; ruin.

There is in it such a labefaction of all principles as may be injurious to mortality. Barwell.

Labefy (lab'e-fi), v. t. To weaken or impair.

Label (la'bi), n. [O. Fr. label, lambel, labeau, a rag, a tatter, a shred; either of Germanic or of Celtic origin; comp. G. lappen, a flap, patch, rag, and W. llab, a strip, llabed, a label; Gael. lead, a shred.] 1. A slip of silk, paper, parchment, or other material, containing a name, title, address, or the like, and affixed to anything, indicating its nature, contents, ownership, destination, or other particulars. — 2. A narrow slip of parchment or paper, or a ribbon of silk, affixed to diplomas, deeds, or writings to hold the appended seal. — 3. Any paper annexed to a will by way of addition, as a codicil. — 4. In her. a fillet with pendants or points, a figure usually added to coat-armour to mark a distinction in the arms of the eldest son during the life of the father, in which case it has three points. A label of five points is the distinction of the heir whilst the grandfather is living; one of seven points, the difference for Label of three points, the heir in the lifetime of his great-grandfather; and so on. The label is also termed a Lambel, sometimes a Fillet. 5. A long thin brass rule, with a small sight at one end and a centre-hole at the other, commonly used with a tangent line on the edge of a circumferentor, to take altitudes, &c.—6. † A tassell. Fuller. — 7. In Goth. arch. a projecting tablet or moulding over doors, windows, &c., called a hood-moulding, and a drip, dripstone, or weather-moulding when it is turned square. — 8. A pendant like a broad ribbon hanging from the head-dress and helmet of a knight.

Labarum.—Medal of Constantine.

Label (la'bi), v. t. pret. & pp. labelled; ppr. labelling. To affix a label to.

It shall be inventoried, and every particle and utensil labelled. Shak.

Labeller (la'bi-er), n. One who affixes labels to anything.

Labellum (la-bel'lum), n. [L., a little lip.] A term applied in botany to one of the three pieces forming the corolla in orchideous plants. It is often spurred.

Labent (la'bent), a. [L. labens, labentis, ppr of labor, to slide.] Sliding; gliding. [Rare.]

Labia (la'bi-a), n. pl. [From L. labium, a lip.] In anat. the lips. Applied also to the parts of the pendulum exterior to the nymphs.

Labial (la'bi-al), a. [Fr., from L. labium, a lip. See LIP.] 1. Pertaining to the lips. 'A labial gland or vein.' Dunglison. — 2. Formed by the lips; owing its special character to the lips; as, a labial articulation, a labial consonant, namely one such as b, p, and m.

Labial (la'bi-al), n. A letter or character representing a sound or articulation formed or uttered chiefly by the lips, as b, f, m, p, v, are called labials.

Labially (la'bi-al-ly), adv. In a labial manner; by means of the lips.

Labiate (la-bi-a'te), n. pl. [See LABIATE.] The mint tribe, a very important and extensive natural order of exogenous plants, with a labiate corolla, and a four-lobed ovary, changing to four seed-like monospermous fruits. This order contains about 2600 species, mostly herbs, undershrubs, or shrubs, rarely arborescent, with opposite or whorled leaves, usually square stems, and a thyrsoid or whorled inflorescence. They are spread throughout the world, being most strongly represented in the Mediterranean and eastern regions, but abounding in all temperate latitudes. Many of the species are valued for their fragrance, as lavender and thyme; others for their stimulating qualities, as mint and peppermint; others as aromatics, as savory, basil, and marjoram; several are used as febrifuges, as the Ocimum febrifugum of Sierra Leone. Rosemary is used in the manufacture of Hungary-water, and its oil is that which gives the green colour to bear's-grease and such pomatums. Betony, ground-ivy, horehound, and others possess bitter tonic qualities. Numerous species are objects of great beauty, as various kinds of sage, Gardquoia, and Draccephalum. Also called Lamiaceae.

Flower of Orchis maculata. L. Labellum.

Label of three points.

Fâte, fâr, fat, fâll; mē, met, hēr; pine, pln; nôte, not, môve; tûbe, tub, bull; ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g. go; j. job; h, Fr. ton; ng, sing; th, then; th, thin; oil, pound; ū, Sc. abune; ŷ, Sc. fey; w, weig; wh, whig; zh, azure. — See KEY Labiata, Labiated (lā'bi-āt, lā'bi-āt-ed), a. [L. labiatus, from L. labium, lip.] In bot. a term applied to an irregular gamopetalous corolla, the limb or expanded portion cleft so as to present an upper and lower lip, the upper consisting of two, the lower of three segments.

Labiatiflorae (lā'bi-ā-ti-flo-ræ), n. pl. [L. labiatus, lipped, from L. labium, a lip, and flor, a flower.] In bot. a section of the nat. order Compositæ. The flowers are mostly hermaphrodite, and the corolla is divided into two lips.

Labiate Corolla.

Labile (lā'bīl), a. [L. labilis, apt to slip, from L. labor, to slide, to slip.] Liable to err, fall, or apostatize. [Rare.]

Liability (lā'bī-lī-tī), a. Liability to lapse or err. Coleridge.

Labimeter, Labidometer (lā-bim'et-er, lā-bī-dom'et-er), n. [Gr. labia, labidos, a forceps, and metron, a measure.] In obstetrics, a scale adapted to the handles of the forceps, which indicates the distance of the blades from each other when applied to the head of the child in the womb.

Labiodental (lā'bī-dēn-tal), a. [L. labium, a lip, and dens, a tooth.] In phonetics, formed or pronounced by the co-operation of the lips and teeth; as, f and v are labiodental letters.

Labiodental (lā'bī-dēn-tal), n. A letter representing a sound pronounced by the co-operation of the lips and teeth.

Labipalpi (lā'bī-pal-pī), n. pl. [L. labium, a lip, and palmus, a feeler.] In entom. the labial feelers in insects.

Labium (lā'bī-um), n. [L., a lip.] A lip; especially, (a) in entom. the lower lip of insects, the upper being called the labrum. (b) In univalve molluscous shells the inner lip of the shell, the outer being called the labrum.

Labor (lā'bor), n. A Mexican land measure, equal to 177 acres. Simmonds.

Laborant (lā'bō-rant), n. A chemist. I can show you a sort of fat sulphur made by an industrious laborant. Boyle.

Laboratory (lā'bō-ra-tō-ri), n. [L. L. laboratorius, Fr. laboratoire, from L. labor, labour. See LABOUR.] 1. A building or workshop designed for investigation and experiment in chemistry, physics, pyrotechnics, or the like. — 2. A place where work is performed or anything is elaborated or prepared for use; hence, the stomach is called the grand laboratory of the human body; the liver the laboratory of the bile.

Laborious (lā'bō-ri-us), a. [L. laboriosus; Fr. laborieux. See LABOUR.] 1. Requiring labour, exertion, or perseverance; toilsome; tiresome; not easy; as, laborious duties or services.

With what compulsion and laborious flight
We sunk thus low. Milton.
Dost thou love watchings, abstinence, or toil, Laborious virtues all? Learn these from Cato. Addison.

2. Using exertion; employing labour; diligent in work or service; assiduous: used of persons; as, a laborious husbandman or mechanic; a laborious minister or pastor. 'Laborious for her people and her poor.' Tennyson. — SYN. Industrious, painstaking, active, diligent, assiduous, toilsome, difficult, arduous, wearisome, fatiguing, troublesome, tedious.

Laboriously (lā'bō-ri-us-lī), adv. In a laborious manner; with labour, toil, or difficulty.

Laboriousness (lā'bō-ri-us-ness), n. 1. The quality of being laborious or attended with toil; toilsomeness; difficulty. — 2. Diligence; assiduity.

Laboriousness shuts the doors and stops all the avenues of the mind. South.

Labour (lā'ber), n. [Fr. labour, L. labor, labour.] 1. Exertion, physical or mental, or both undergone in the performance of some task or work; particularly, the exertion of the body in occupations by which subsistence is obtained, as in agriculture and manufactures, in contradistinction to the exertion of strength in play or amusements, which are denominated exercise rather than labour; any kind of exertion which is attended with fatigue; the performance of work; toil; as, after the labours of the day the farmer retires, and rest is sweet; moderate labour contributes to health; the labour of compiling and writing a history.

What is obtained by labour will of right be the property of him by whose labour it is gained. Rambler.

2. Work done or to be done; that which requires wearisome exertion or strong effort; a work.

Being a labour of so great difficulty, the exact performance thereof we may rather wish than look for. Hooker.

3. Labourers or producers in the aggregate; as, the claims or rights of labour. — 4. Travail; the pangs and efforts of childbirth. — 5. In Scip. suffering; trial. Rev. xiv. 13. — Laborious labour, in obstetrics, labour which is accompanied with much suffering, and is unusually difficult. — SYN. Work, toil, task, drudgery, exertion, effort.

Labour (lā'ber), v. i. 1. To exert muscular strength; to act or move with painful effort, particularly in servile occupations; to work; to toil.

Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work. Ex. xx. 9.

2. To exert one's powers of body or mind, or both, in the prosecution of any design; to endeavour; to strive; to take pains; as, he laboured to make himself intelligible.

Labour not for the meat which perisheth. Jn. vi. 27.
Labour to thy power to make thy body go of thy soul's errands. Jer. Taylor.

3. To be burdened; to be oppressed with difficulties; to proceed or act with difficulty.

Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Mat. xi. 28.

In this sense often with under (formerly sometimes of); as, to labour under a disease.

Absolute monarchy labours under the worst of all disadvantages. Brougham.

4. To be in travail; to suffer the pangs of childbirth. — 5. Naut. to move irregularly with little progress; to pitch and roll heavily, as a ship in a turbulent sea. — SYN. To work, toil, strive, struggle, plod, drudge, slave, suffer.

Lactifuge (lak-ti-fúj), n. [L. lac, milk, and fugo, to expel.] A medicine which checks or diminishes the secretion of milk in the breast.

Lactine, Lactose (lak'tin, lak'tós), n. [Fr. lactine, from L. lac, milk.] Sugar of milk ($C_{12}H_{22}O_{11}$), a substance obtained by evaporating whey, filtering through animal charcoal, and crystallizing. It forms hard, white, semi-transparent trimetric crystals, which have a slightly sweet taste, and grate between the teeth. It is convertible like starch into glucose by boiling with very dilute sulphuric acid. Nitric acid converts it into malic, oxalic, and mucic or saccharic acid.

Lacto-butyrometer (lak'tó-bú-ti-róm'et-ér), n. [L. lac, milk, Gr. butyron, butter, and metron, measure.] A kind of lactometer for ascertaining the quantity of butyric matter any particular milk contains.

Lacto-densimeter (lak'tó-den-sim'et-ér), n. [L. lac, milk, densus, dense, and Gr. metron, measure.] A kind of hydrometer for finding the density of milk, and thus discovering whether it has been mixed with water.

Lactometer (lak-tóm'et-ér), n. [L. lac, milk, and Gr. metron, a measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the different qualities of milk. Several instruments of this sort have been invented. One consists of a glass tube 1 foot long, graduated into 100 parts. New milk is filled into it and allowed to stand until the cream has fully separated, when its relative quantity is shown by the number of parts in the 100 which it occupies. Called also Galactometer.

Lactone (lak'tón), n. ($C_4H_6O_2$). A colourless volatile liquid, possessing an aromatic smell, produced, along with lactide, by the dry distillation of lactic acid.

Lactory (lak'tó-ri), a. Lactiferous; lactary.

Lactoscope (lak'tó-skóp), n. [L. lac, milk, and Gr. skopos, to see.] An instrument for estimating the quantity of cream in milk by ascertaining its opacity.

Lactose. See LACTINE.

Lactuca (lak'tú-ka), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Compositae, sub-order Cichoraceae. It includes about sixty species of annual and biennial herbs, many of which are eminently useful as salad and culinary plants. They are smooth (rarely hispid) plants abounding in milky juice, of erect habit, having entire or pinnate leaves, and yellow or blue flowers in paniculate heads, and are chiefly natives of Europe, Asia, Africa, and the northern parts of America. Many varieties are cultivated in our gardens, and all of these are divided into two groups, cabbage-lettuces, with round depressed or spreading cabbage-like heads, and cos-lettuces (which take their name from the island of Cos, in the Grecian Archipelago), growing erect and oblong. Four species are found wild in Britain. The milky juice of the different species is usually bitter, astringent, and narcotic, especially in L. virosa. L. sativa (garden-lettuce) is one of the principal kinds of vegetables used for salads. See LACTUCARIUM.

Lactucarium (lak'tú-ká-ri-um), n. [From L. lactuca, lettuce, from lac, milk.] The impure milky juice of Lactuca sativa or garden-lettuce, and also of L. virosa, L. scariola, and L. altissima. It possesses slight anodyne properties, and is sometimes used as a substitute for opium.

Lactucic (lak-tú'sik), a. Pertaining to plants of the genus Lactuca.

Lactumien (lak-tú'men), n. [L., from lac, milk, so named from the white colour of the pustules.] In med. the milk-scab, which affects children at the breast.

Lacuna (la-kú'na), n. pl. Lacunae (la-kú'næ). [L., a hollow.] 1. A pit or depression; a small blank space; a gap; a hiatus.—2. In bot. (a) one of the small hollows or pits on the upper surface of the thallus of lichens. (b) A name given occasionally to the internal organ, commonly called an air-cell, lying in the midst of the cellular tissue of plants. 3. above the other. From the study of these numerous fresh-water deposits geologists obtain a knowledge of the ancient condition of the land.—Lacustrine or lake dwellings, the name given to ancient habitations built on small islands in lakes, or on platforms supported by piles near the shores of lakes. Herodotus describes certain dwellings of this kind on Lake Prasina in Thrace as being approached by a narrow bridge, each habitation having a trap-door in the floor, giving access to the water beneath, through which fish were caught. The remains of a great number of such dwellings, some of them belonging to prehistoric times, have been met with in Europe, among the first having been discovered in 1830 in the small lake of Lagore, in the county of Meath, Ireland, in which country they are styled crannogs or crannoghs. Similar remains have since been discovered in lakes in Scotland, Switzerland, and elsewhere, the level of the lakes often having risen since the dwellings were inhabited. Dwellings not dissimilar are still constructed by the natives of Borneo, New Guinea, and other countries.

Lad, Ladde, pret. of lade. Led; carried. Chaucer; Spenser.

Lad (lad), n. [Of doubtful origin. In O.E. ladda is generally used of a man of inferior station. Perhaps modified by influence of ladder, led (as if one who is led), from O.E. lode, a man, A.Sax. lodd, lode, a man, a countryman; loddan, Goth. ludan, to grow. The W. ladd, a lad, is by some regarded as the original. Lass, supposed to be a contraction of ladass, or of W. lodes, a girl, is the feminine corresponding to lad.] 1. The animals are protected by a lateral bivalve shell, the two valves of which articulate over the back, and are opened by an elastic ligament and closed by one or two adductor muscles. The shell is secreted by a prolongation of the integument called the mantle or pallium, which laps round the body, its halves being either free or united so as to leave only three apertures for the inlet and outlet of water for respiration, and for the protrusion of a fleshy organ called the foot, when it is present. The muscular edge of the mantle leaves on each valve an impression called the pallial line. Respiration is effected by two pairs of lamellated gills (whence the name), occupying a large portion of the interior of the shell on each side. The mouth is a simple jawless fissure, furnished with one or two pairs of soft palpi, the food being conveyed to it by cilia on the gills. The heart has a single ventricle pierced by the intestine, and there are three double nerve centres.

family Vulturidae, forming a link between the vultures and the eagles. It inhabits the Swiss and German Alps, as well as the higher mountains of Asia and Africa, and is the largest European bird of prey, measuring upwards of 4 feet from beak to tail, and 9 or 10 in the expanse of its wings. Besides eating carrion, it preys on living chamois, ibex, kids, hares, and such like animals, but it does not disdain when pressed rats, mice, and other small quadrupeds. Written also Lammerguter, Lammerguter.

Lamnidae (lam'ní-dé), n. pl. The porbeagles, a family of sharks. A nearly symmetrical tail, pectoral fins placed behind the gill-openings, two spineless dorsal fins and an anal fin, are the most prominent characteristics. The porbeagle shark and the basking shark or sun-fish belong to this family. The fossil teeth of sharks of the genus Lamna are plentiful in the chalk and tertiary formations. They are thin, smooth-edged but sharp, and have a process like a small tooth on each side near the base.

Lamp (lamp), n. (Fr. lampe, L. Or lampas, from Or lamps, to shine.) 1. A vessel for containing oil or other liquid inflammable substance, to be burned by means of a wick, any contrivance for producing artificial light, whether by means of an inflammable liquid or of gas. Hence—2. Anything suggesting the light of a lamp, whether in appearance or use, anything possessing or communicating light, real or metaphorical.

The gentle eyes shed forth a quickening light, And shed the dying lamp of life within me. Keats.

Lamp (lamp), v. t. [A form of lamp.] To walk quickly and with long strides. [Scotch.]

It was all her father's own fault, that let her run lamping about the country, riding on bare-backed horses. Sir H. Scott.

--keen, glancing, arrowy radiations of anguish. De Quincey.

Lancination (lan-sin-á-shon), n. Laceration; wounding. Lancinations of the spirit. Jer. Taylor.

Land (land), n. (Found in the same form in all the Teutonic languages and with only very doubtful connections in the other Indo-European tongues, the Fr. lande, It. and Sp. landa, a heath, a wide extent of waste ground, a plain, being from the Celtic lanu, older land, originally, a thorny or spiny bush.)

1. Earth, or the solid matter which constitutes the fixed part of the surface of the globe, in distinction from the sea or other waters, which constitute the fluid or movable part; as, the globe consists of land and water; a sailor in a long voyage longs to see land.—2. Any portion of the solid superficial part of the globe considered as set apart or belonging to an individual or a people, as a country, estate, farm, or tract.

Go, view the land, even Jericho. Josh. ii. 1.

3. Ground; soil, or the superficial part of the earth in respect to its nature or quality; as, good land; poor land; moist or dry land.—4. In law, a generic term comprehending every species of ground or earth, as meadows, pastures, woods, moors, waters, marshes, furze, and heath, including also messuages, tofts, crofts, mills, castles, and other buildings.—5. The inhabitants of a country or region; a nation or people.

These answers in the silent night received,
The king himself divined, the land believed.
Dryden.

6. The ground left unploughed between furrows. Hence.—7. The part of the bore of a rifle between the grooves.—8. In Scotland, a house consisting of different stories, or more especially a building including different tenements, is called a land.—To make the land, or to make land (naut.), to discover land from the sea as the ship approaches it.—To shut in the land, to lose sight of the land left by the intervention of a point or promontory.—To set the land, to see by the compass how it bears from the ship.—To lay the land, to sail from it until it begins to appear lower and smaller by reason of the convexity of the surface of the sea.—To raise the land, to sail towards it until it appears to be raised or elevated.

Land (land), v. t. 1. To set on shore; to disembark; to debark; as, to land troops; to land goods.

Moving up the coast they landed him. Tennyson.

Land-carriage (land'-kar-rij), n. Carriage or transportation by land.

Land-crab (land'-krab), n. A crustacean whose habits are terrestrial, as distinguished from one whose habits are aquatic; particularly, one of the species of Geocarcinus, which live much on land, and only visit the sea to deposit their eggs. The best known is G. ruricola, found in the higher parts of Jamaica, which often proves very destructive to the sugar plantations.

Land-damn (land'-dam), v. t. To banish from the land; to exile.

You are abused and by some putter-on
That will be damned for't; would I knew the villain,
I would land-damn him. Shak.

[The reading and meaning of this passage are, however, doubtful.]

Land (land), n. (Fr. See LAND.) A heath; a heathy or sandy plain incapable of bearing cereals. The term landes is specifically applied to extensive areas in France stretching from the mouth of the Garonne along the Bay of Biscay and inward towards Bordeaux. They bear chiefly heath and broom, but on the seaward side are largely planted with sea-pine. The inland plains are chiefly occupied as sheep-runs. The landes are dry in summer and marshy in winter.

Should auld acquaintance be forgot,

And days o' langsyne.

Burns.

Langterloo (lang'tër-a-lö'), n. A game at cards. See LANTERLOO.

Language (lang'gwä), n. [O.E. langage, Fr. langage, Fr. linguagie, lenguage, lengage; It. linguaggio; from L. lingua, the tongue (which takes the form lingue in Fr.), and the L.L. term aticum; allied to L. lingo, Gr. λέω, Skr. liḥ, to lick.] 1. Human speech; the expression of thoughts by words or articulate sounds; as, language is the peculiar possession of man.—2. A particular set of articulate sounds used in the expression of thoughts; the aggregate of the words employed by any community for intercommunication; as, the English language; the Greek language.—Philologists have classified the languages of the earth on two principles; first, according to the structure of the language or the manner in which its sounds are formed or combined; and, secondly, according to their genetic connection or relationship as to origin. The first kind of classification is called the morphological, the second the genealogical. According to the morphological classification three forms of structure in languages are usually distinguished—the isolating, the agglutinating, and the inflectional. The isolating languages, of which the Chinese is an example, are composed entirely of monosyllabic unchangeable roots, which may indeed be compounded with one another in order to express their mutual relations, but as a rule retain their independence. The agglutinating languages are such as possess certain unalterable roots to which other syllables, which are capable of modification, and which do not retain an independent signification, are affixed to express relations. Of this class are the Mongolic or Turanian languages. A subdivision of this class consists of those languages, such as the American, which attach all the subordinate or less important members of a sentence to the main root as terminations, and which are called the incorporating. The inflectional languages, which are the most highly developed, are those in which all the roots are capable of being modified to express different relations or shades of meaning. Philologists believe that all languages which have reached this highest stage must previously have passed through the other two stages. When classified genealogically languages are divided into families or groups in which a community of origin is distinctly traceable. Such are the Aryan or Indo-European family (comprising Sanskrit, Persian, Slavonic, Greek, Latin, Gothic, &c.), and the Semitic family (comprising Hebrew, Arabic, Aramaic, &c.), which are the only two families which have reached the inflectional stage of morphological development. 3. Words or expressions appropriate to or especially employed in any branch of knowledge; as, the language of chemistry.—4. Style; manner of expression, either by speech or writing.

Others for language all their care express. Pope.

5. The inarticulate sounds by which irrational animals express their feelings and wants.—6. The expression of thought in any way articulate or inarticulate, conventional or unconventional; as, the language of signs; the language of the eyes; the language of flowers, &c.

The language of the eyes frequently supplies the place of that of the tongue. Crabb.

7. A nation as distinguished by its speech. Dan. iii. 7.

La Valette was obliged to refuse the application of twelve knights of the langue of Italy, on the ground that the complement of the garrison was full. Prescott.

SYN. Speech, tongue, dialect, idiom, style, diction.

'The smallest lappas in style or propriety.' Swift. 3. In eccles. law, the slip or omission of a patron to present a clerk to a benefice within six months after it becomes void. In this case the benefice is said to be lapped, or in lappas. — 4. In theol. the fall or apostasy of Adam.

Lappas (lap'as), v. t. pret. & pp. lapped; pp. lapping. 1. To pass slowly, silently, or by degrees, to glide; to slip; to slide; to fall, to sink.

This disposition to shorten out words by retouching the vowels, is besting also but a tendency to lappas into the barbarity of those northern nations from which we descended. Swift

Never, in his character of Vulcan and Theron, has lappas into the burlesque character. Addison.

2. To slide or slip in moral conduct; to fall in duty, to deviate from rectitude, to commit a fault.

To lappas in fulness is never then to be for need. Shel.

3. To fall or pass from one proprietor to another, by the omission, negligence, or failure of some one, as a patron, a legatee, &c.

If the archbishop shall not fill it up within six months ensuing, it lappas to the king. Appl.

4. In law, to become ineffectual or void.

Lappa (lap-a), v. t. 1. To cause or suffer to slide, to let slip, to lose; to suffer to become vacant.

He counts the living loss to dissipate, not to make profit of. He turns more to lappa his connections than his living. Fuller.

2. To seize, to capture, to apprehend.

It might have since been answered in repaying what we took from them, which for traffic a cake, Most of our city did only myself stand out, For which, if I be deposed in this place, I shall pay dear. Shel

Lapped (lap'ed), a. and a. Having passed slowly, silently, or by degrees, fallen, sunk, as the lapped menses, having become ineffectual or void, or having passed from one to another. — Lapped legacy, in law, a legacy which falls to the heirs through the failure of the legatee, as when the legatee dies before the testator. In this case, where it is not otherwise directed in the settlement, the lapped legacy falls into and becomes part of the residue of the estate. — Lapped driver, in law, a device which fails or becomes void by reason of the devise's death in the testator's lifetime, or by reason of such device being contrary to law.

Laten (lâ'ten), n. Same as LATTEN.

Lateny (lâ'ten-ai), n. [See LATENT.] The state of being latent or concealed.

To simplify the discussion, I shall distinguish three degrees of this latency. Sir W. Hamilton.

Lateness (lât'nes), n. 1. The state of being tardy, or of coming after the usual or appointed time; as, the lateness of spring or of harvest.—2. Time far advanced in any particular period; as, lateness of the day or night; lateness in the season. 'Lateness in life.' Swift.

Latent (lât'ent), a. [L. latens, latens, from latere, to lurk; allied to Gr. lanthanô, lathên, to escape notice.] Not visible or apparent; hid; concealed; secret; not seen; not manifested; as, latent motives; latent reasons; latent springs of action.

These are very imperfect rudiments of 'Paradise Lost'; but it is pleasant to see great works in their seminal state, pregnant with latent possibilities of excellence. Johnson.

—Latent fault, in Scots law, a blemish or defect in a commodity purchased which was concealed from the purchaser, or was not manifest. This entitles the purchaser to reject the article.—Latent heat, concealed or hidden heat; that portion of heat which exists in any body without producing any effect upon another, or upon the thermometer: termed also Insensible Heat, in distinction from sensible heat. Latent heat becomes sensible during the conversion of vapours into liquids and of liquids into solids; and, on the other hand, a portion of sensible heat disappears or becomes latent when a body changes its form from the solid to the liquid, or from the liquid to the gaseous or aeriform state. See HEAT.

—Latent period of a disease, the period that elapses before the presence of the disease is manifested by any symptoms. Thus the latent period of small-pox, measles, &c., signifies the time that elapses from the moment of infection to the accession of the symptoms. Called also Period of Incubation.

Latently (lât'ent-li), adv. In a latent manner.

Lateral (lat'er-al), a. [Fr.; L. lateralis, from latus, lateralis, a side.] Pertaining or belonging to the side; hence, (a) directed to the side; as, the lateral view of an object. (b) Proceeding from the side; as, the lateral branches of a tree; lateral shoots.—Lateral operation, in surgery, the name given to one mode of cutting for the stone, because the prostate gland and neck of the bladder are divided laterally. See LITHOTOMY.—Lateral pressure or stress, a pressure at right angles to the length, as of a beam.—Lateral strength, in mech. the force with which a body, as a bar or beam, placed horizontally, resists another force acting upon it in a court of the Jewish tabernacle, where the officiating priests washed their hands and feet, and the entrails of victims.

That spirit moves
In the green valley, where the silver brook
From its full laver, pours the white cascade.

Longfellow.

2.† One who laves or washes; a washer. Huot.

Laver (lā'vēr), n. [From L. lavo, to wash.] A name given to two species of algae of the genus Porphyra, P. laciniata and P. vulgaris. They are employed as food, salted, eaten with pepper, vinegar, and oil; and are said to be useful in scrofulous affections and glandular tumours. — Green laver is the Uva latissima. It also is employed as food, stewed and seasoned with lemon-juice, and is ordered for scrofulous patients. Called also Stokes or Stoakan.

Laver-bread (lā'vēr-bred), n. A sort of food made from green laver (Uva latissima); sometimes called Oyster-green.

Lavolt, Lavolta (lā'völt, lā'völt'a), n. [It. la volta, the turn.] An old dance in which was much turning and capering. It was popular in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and was probably not unlike the modern polka.

I cannot sing.

Shak.

Nor heed the high lavolt.

They bid us to the English dancing schools.

And teach lavoltas high, and swift corantos. Shak.

Lavoltateer (lā'völt'a-tēr), n. One who dances the lavolta; a dancer. 'A lavoltateer, a saltatory, a dancer.' Beau. & Fl.

Lavours, n. pl. Lavera. Chaucer.

Lav (lā), n. [A Sax. lagu, from same root as lie and lay (see LAY, LIE); cogn. Sw. lag, Icel. lag, lög, Dan. lov, a law. The same root is also in L. lex, a law. (See also LOW.) The word corresponds in radical meaning to G. geset, law, from setzen, to place; Gr. thesmos, from root of tithēmi, to place, and L. statutum, a statute.] 1. A rule of action or conduct laid down or prescribed by authority; an edict of a ruler or a government; an expressed command; a decree; an order.

Our human laws are but the copies, more or less imperfect, of the eternal laws to far as we can read them, and either succeed and promote our welfare, or fail and bring confusion and disaster, according as the legislator's insight has detected the true principle, or has been distorted by ignorance or selfishness.

F. A. Froese.

2. In a collective sense, the appointed rules of a community or state for the control of its inhabitants, whether unwritten, as the common law of England, or enacted by formal statute.

And sovereign Law, that state's collected will,
O'er thrones and globes elate,
Sits empress, crowning good, repressing ill.

Sir W. Jones.

3. One of the rules or principles by which anything is regulated; as, the laws of the turf; the laws of verification. — 4. The proposition which expresses the constant or regular order according to which an energy or agent operates; the proposition expressive of the uniform methods or relations according to which material and mental forces act in producing effects, or are manifested in phenomena; a theoretical principle deduced from practice or observation; as, the law of gravitation; a geological law; the laws of physical descent; the law of self-preservation. — 5. In math. a rule according to which anything, as the change of value of a variable, or the value of the terms of a series, proceeds; mode of sequence. — 6. In theol. a term variously used. In the Bible it often includes the whole of revelation, doctrinal as well as preceptive; but it is often also used, in a more restricted sense, to signify the books of Moses, the whole Jewish scriptures being comprehended under the designation 'the law and the prophets.' A very common use of the term is to denote the preceptive part of revelation in contradistinction to the doctrinal, the one part being called the law, and the other the gospel. When employed in Scripture with exclusive reference to the preceptive part of revelation, the term law sometimes signifies the Jewish code of precepts as to rites and ceremonies, called the ceremonial law, and which is regarded as having been abrogated when the Jewish dispensation gave place to the Christian. — 7. The reference of a dispute to judicial decision; the adoption of the steps necessary to bring a disputed point before a tribunal for decision; judicial process; litigation; as, to go to law.

Tom Toohey is a fellow famous for taking the law of every body.

He needs no indirect nor lawless course. Shak.

3. Not subject to the ordinary laws of nature; uncontrolled.

He, meteor-like, flames lawless through the void.

Pope.

Lawlessly (lā'les-lī), adv. In a lawless manner, or in a manner contrary to law; unlawfully.

Lawlessness (lā'les-nes), n. The condition or quality of being lawless, or of being unrestrained, unauthorized, or uncontrolled by law; want of legitimacy.

This controversy, concerning the degree of lawlessness with which the conditions of the solution may be assumed, is of consequence. Whewell.

Law-list (lā'list), n. A published list of all the persons, as judges, barristers, conveyancers, draughtsmen, special pleaders, solicitors, attorneys, connected with the profession of the law in a country.

Law-merchant (lā'mér-chant), n. Commercial law; a system of rules by which trade and commerce are regulated.

Lawmonger (lā'mung-ger), n. A low practitioner of law; a pettifogger.

Though this chattering lawmonger be bold to call it wicked.

Milton.

Lawn (lān), n. [O.E. lawn, lawn, a clear space in a forest, a wild shrubby or woody track (see LAUND), from W. llan, an inclosed space, or from French word of kindred origin. See LAND.] 1. An open space between woods; a glade in a forest. — 2. A space of ground covered with grass, and kept smoothly mown, generally in front of or around a mansion. — 3. [Because from its fineness it was bleached on a lawn or smooth grassy sward.] A sort of fine linen or cambric. Its use in the sleeves and some other parts of the dress of bishops explains the following line and similar allusions.

A saint in crape is twice a saint in lawn. Pope.

Lawn (lān), a. Made of lawn.

Lawn'd (lānd), a. See LAUND.

Lawn-mower (lānmō-ēr), n. One who or that which mows a lawn; specifically, a machine for cutting sward. A usual form of lawn-mower consists of a revolving cylinder, armed with spiral knives which rotate in contact with the rectilinear edge of a stationary knife placed tangentially to them.

consisting entirely of trees and shrubs, inhabiting the warmer parts of the world, and in most cases aromatic. They have insignificant flowers, the perianth is deeply cleft, four to ten lobed, the stamens are definite, and the fruit (a berry or drupe) is indehiscent, the two or four seeded anthers open by recurved valves. Cinnamon, nutmeg, nutmeg, and nutmeg are products of the order. The best known species is the Laureus nobilis, or sweet-bay.

Laureate (lô-rê-âs), a. [L. laureatus, from laurea, a laurel.] Decked or invested with laurel. 'Laureate leaves' Milton.

But on how long have laureate men reigned. Pope.
—Past laureate, (a) in the English universities, one who received an honourable degree at a university for grammar, including poetry and rhetoric, so called from his being crowned with laurel; (b) in Great Britain, an officer belonging in virtue of his office to the royal household who was formerly required to compose an ode annually for the sovereign's birthday, for a great national victory, and the like—a requirement discontinued since the reign of George III., the post being now a sinecure. A throne of canary was formerly part of the emblems, but this has been changed to a money plant.

Laureate (lô-rê-âs), a. One crowned with laurel, a poet laureate.

Also a few verses worth their odor air.
They scarce can bear their laurels twice a year. Pope.

Laureate (lô-rê-âs), v. t. & p. p. laureated, ppr. laureating. 1. To honour with a degree in the university, and a wreath of laurel. — 2. To invest with the office of poet laureate. Pope.

Laureateship (lô-rê-âs-ship), n. Office of a laureate, the post of a poet laureate.

Laureation (lô-rê-âs-ion), n. The act of crowning with laurel; the act of conferring a degree in a university, together with a wreath of laurel—an honour formerly conferred for excellence in poetry and rhetoric.

On which occasion (i. e. taking degrees in grammar) a wreath of laurel was presented to the new graduate, who was afterwards usually styled 'poet laureate.' These laureate laureates seem to have given rise to the application in question.

Laurel (lô-rê), n. [O.E. laurel, laure, Fr. laurier, Sp. laurel, L. laurus.] 1. A plant belonging to the genus Laurus, nat. order Lauraceae, to which it gives the name. The genus is distinguished by the leaves, which have a single midrib, and by the twelve stamens, all of which are fertile, with two-lobed anthers, and two glands, one at each side. The sweet-bay or laurel (Laurus nobilis Linn.) is a native of Africa and south of Europe, and is cultivated in our gardens not only on account of its elegant appearance, but also for the aromatic fragrance of its evergreen leaves. The fruit, which is of a purple colour, and also the leaves, have long been used in medicine as stimulents and carminatives. The common or cherry laurel is Prunus lauro-cerasus, the spurge-laurel the Daphne laureola. In ancient times, heroes and scholars were crowned with bay leaves and berries, whence the terms laurel wreath and laureate. Hence 2. (a) a crown of laurel, and figuratively honour, fame, distinction, as, to win laurels on the field of battle.—3. Lava (lô-vâ), n. [It. from L. laeo, to wash.] The general term for all rock matter that flows in a molten state from volcanoes, and which when cooled down forms varieties of tuff, trachyte, trachytic greenstone, and basalt, according to the varying proportions of felspar, borax, and soda, &c., which enter into the composition of the mass, and according to the slowness or rapidity with which it has cooled. The more rapidly this process of cooling goes on the more compact is the rock. Lava beds are of two kinds, namely, conspicuous and intrusive. A conspicuous lava bed is one which has been poured out over the surface of a deposit, and covered by subsequent deposits. Such a bed is in its natural position, and usually alters only the bed beneath it. The lava stone associated with the limestone strata of Derbyshire is an example of conspicuous lava. Intrusive beds are those which have been forced up in a molten state through or between strata, altering them on both sides. The sheets of dolerite occurring on Arthur's Seat, Edinburgh, are examples of intrusive lava beds. — Lava mounds, a hard and coarse basaltic millstone, obtained from quarries near Andernach on the Rhine.

Laureola (lô-rê-ô-lâ), n. [It. from L. laeo, to wash.] A genus of perennial undershrubs and herbs, belonging to the nat. order Labiales, natives of dry hilly places in the Mediterranean region, the Canary Islands, Madeira, &c.

LAVYER (lā'vēr), n. A sort of dance, from same root as lavay (see LAVAY), and lavay, lavay, lavay, a law. The same root is also in Lave, a law. (See also LAVE.) The word corresponds in radical meaning to G. lavare, law, from lavare, to place, or lavare, from root of lavare, to place, and L. lavare, a statute. 1. A rule of action or conduct laid down or promulgated by authority, an edict of a ruler or a government, an expressed command, a decree, an order.

Our human laws are but the copies, more or less imperfect, of the eternal law to which we are bound.

2. In a collective sense, the appointed rules of a community or state for the control of its inhabitants, whether unwritten, as the common law of England, or enacted by formal statute.

And sovereign Law, that does not collect will,
Or choose and please itself,
But imposes, crowning good, repeating ill.

3. One of the rules or principles by which anything is regulated, as, the laws of the art; the laws of veneration. 4. In moral a rule according to which anything, as the change of value of a variable, or the value of the terms of a series, proceeds, a mode of sequence. — 6. In that a term variously used. In the Bible it often includes the whole of revelation, doctrinal as well as preceptive; but it is often also used, in a more restricted sense, to signify the books of Moses, the whole Jewish scriptures being comprehended under the designation 'the law and the prophets.' A very common use of the term is to denote the preceptive part of revelation in contradistinction to the doctrinal, the one part being called the law, and the other the gospel. When employed in Scripture with exclusive reference to the preceptive part of revelation, the term law sometimes signifies the Jewish code of precepts as to rites and ceremonies, called the ceremonial law, and which is regarded as having been abrogated when the Jewish dispensation gave place to the Christian. — 7. The reference of a dispute to judicial decision, the adoption of the steps necessary to bring a disputed point before a tribunal for decision, judicial process, litigation, as, to go to law.

Tom Trenchard is a fellow lawyer for taking the law of every body.

8. Lead (lêd), n. [A Sax. lead, lêd, the metal lead; allied to D. lood, Sw. and Dan. lod, G. loth, a weight, a plummet, the lead for taking soundings; Icel. ledda, a sounding line.] Syn. Pb. At. wt. 207. 1. A metal of a bluish-gray colour; when recently cut it has a strong metallic lustre, but soon tarnishes by exposure to the air owing to the formation of a coating of carbonate of lead. Its specific gravity is about 11.35. It is soft, flexible, and inelastic. It is both malleable and ductile, possessing the former property to a considerable extent, but in tenacity it is inferior to all ductile metals. It fuses at about 612°, and when slowly cooled forms octohedral crystals. There are four oxides of lead:—

(1.) The suboxide (Pb₂O), of a grayish-blue colour. (2.) The protoxide or yellow oxide (PbO), called also massicot. Litharge is this oxide in the form of small spangles from having undergone fusion. (3.) The red oxide (Pb₃O₄), the well-known pigment called red-lead or minium. (4.) The dioxide or brown oxide (PbO₂), obtained by putting red-lead in chlorine water or in dilute nitric acid. Of the salts formed by the action of acids on lead or on the protoxide, the carbonate or white-lead and the acetate or sugar of lead are the most important. The protoxide is also employed for glazing earthenware and porcelain. Carbonate of lead is the basis of white oil paint, and of a number of other colours. The extract of lead is a subacetate, and is used as a test and precipitant. The salts of lead are poisonous, but the carbonate is by far the most virulent poison. The lead of commerce, which commonly contains silver, iron, and copper, is extracted from the native sulphide, the galena of mineralogists. The other ores of importance are the selenide, native minium, plumb gomme, white-lead, vitreous lead, phosphate of lead, chloride or horn lead, arsenate of lead. See WHITE-LEAD.—Black-lead. See GRAPHITE.—2. A plummet or mass of lead used in sounding at sea.—To heave the lead, to throw it into the sea for the purpose of taking soundings.—3. In printing, a thin plate of metal used to give space between lines.—4. A small stick of black-lead or plumbago used in pencils.—5. pl. A flat roof covered with lead.—The tempest crackles on the leads. Tennyson.

Lead (lêd), a. Made or composed of lead; consisting more or less of lead; produced by lead.—Lead poisoning, poisoning by the introduction of various preparations of lead, as sugar of lead, white-lead, &c., into the body. The disease, if not arrested at an early stage, takes the following forms, each of which may exist alone, or may be complicated with one or more of the others, or may follow the others, there being no definite order of succession: lead colic or painters' colic, lead rheumatism, lead palsy, and disease of the brain.

Lead (lêd), v. t. 1. To cover with lead; to fit with lead.—2. In printing, to widen the space between lines by inserting a lead or thin plate of type-metal.

Leaf (léf), n. pl. Leaves (lévz). [A Sax. leaf, com. O Sax. lóf, Goth. lauh, lead, lauh, Dan. løv, D. loof, G. laub, a leaf, allied to lith. lapea, a leaf] 1. In bot. the green deciduous part of a plant, usually shooting from the sides of the stem and branches, but sometimes from the root, by which the sap is supposed to be elaborated or fitted for the nourishment of the plant by being exposed to air and light on its extensive surface. When fully developed the leaf generally consists of two parts, an expanded part, called the blade or limb, and a stalk supporting that part, called the petiole or leaf-stalk. Frequently, however, the petiole is wanting, in which case the leaf is said to be sessile. Leaves are produced by an expansion of the bark at a node of the stem, and generally consist of vascular tissue in the veins or ribs, with cellular tissue or parenchyma filling up the interstices, and an epidermis over all. Some leaves, however, as those of the mosses, are entirely cellular. See EXTRACT.

A plant is composed of the axis and its appendages, the axis appearing above ground as the stem and branches, below ground as the root, the appendages being entirely above ground, and usually green. All organs which are not formed of the axis being modified leaves. The growth of this consists very much in the gradual transition of one organ into another. In some plants, although not in others, as of Arum and Brickellia, one of the most frequently gradual transitions of leaves into roots, or roots into leaf. The growth of many consists of organs into petals, as seen in the Primula and Urtica, Crocus, &c., and even of stems into joints, often exemplified in the common houseplant, Chamædorea. See 7.

2. Something resembling a leaf in any of its properties, as (a) the joint of a book or folded sheet containing two pages. (b) A side, division, or part of a flat body, the parts of which move on hinges, as folding-doors, window-shutters, a fire-screen, &c. the part of a table which can be raised or lowered at pleasure. (c) A very thin plate of metal, as, gold-leaf. (d) A portion of fat lying in a separate fold or layer. (e) A tooth of a piston, especially when the piston is small. (f) In arch. an ornament resembling or made in imitation of the leaves of certain plants or trees. (g) The brim of a hat, especially of a soft hat.

Harry let down the leaf of his hat and drew it over his eyes to conceal his emotions. Henry Brudenell.

(h) In weaving, the heddle attached to the same shaft and moved at the same time. — Simple leaf, in bot. a leaf consisting of a single piece, the limb or blade not being articulated with the petiole. — Compound leaf, in bot. a leaf composed of several distinct pieces or leaflets, each of which is either articulated to the petiole or connected with it by a narrow part. — To turn over a new leaf (fig.) to adopt a different and better line of conduct.

Leaf (léf), v. t. To shoot out leaves; to produce leaves, as, the trees leaf in May.

Leafage (léf'ij), n. Leaves collectively; abundance of leaves, foliage.

The king's own leech to look into his hurt.

Tennyson.

2. The common name of several genera of discophorous hermaphrodite blood-sucking worms of the order Suctoriora, forming the family Hirudinidae. Leeches chiefly inhabit fresh-water ponds, though some live among moist grass, and some are marine. The body is composed of many rings, and is provided with two suckers, one at either extremity. By adhering with these suckers alternately the animal can draw itself backward or forward. Aquatic leeches can also swim with considerable rapidity. The mouth is situated in the middle of the anterior suckers, and is furnished with three small white teeth, serrated along the edges, and provided with muscles powerful enough to enable the animal to inflict its peculiar tridactylate wound. The species generally employed for medical purposes belong to the genus Sanguisuga, of which genus there are two species employed in Europe, S. officinalis (the Hungarian or green leech), used in the south of Europe, and S. medicinalis (the brown, speckled, or English leech), used in the north of Europe. The latter variety is now rare in this country by reason of the draining of bogs and ponds where it formerly abounded. The horse-leech is Hæmopsis sanguisuga, a common native of Britain.

Lemman, t. n. Same as Leman. Chaucer.

Lemming, Leming (lêm'-ing), n. [Dan. and N.; Sw. lemel.] An English name applied to a group of rodent mammals, very nearly allied to the mouse and rat, and constituting the genus Myodes of some naturalists, Lemmus of others. There are several species, varying in size and colour according to the regions they inhabit. They are found in Norway, Lapland, Siberia, and the northern parts of America. Those of Norway are about the size of a water-rat, while those of Lapland and Siberia are scarcely larger than a field-mouse. The most noted species is the common or European lemming (M. Lemmus). It is very prolific, and vast hordes periodically migrate towards the Atlantic and the Gulf of Bothnia, destroying all vegetation in their path. Vast numbers of wild animals—bears, wolves, foxes—hang upon them in their march, making them their prey, thus tending to keep their numbers in some degree in check. Such migrations are said to portend a hard winter.

Common Lemming (Myodes Lemmus).

Lemmus (lêm'-us), n. See LEMMING.

Lemna (lêm'-na), n. [Gr. lemna, a water-plant.] A genus of well known aquatic annuals, belonging to the nat. order Lemnaceæ or duck-weed tribe. They consist of small or minute floating fronds, with simple roots or rootless, usually propagated by budding, and almost destitute of vascular tissue. The very minute flowers are produced from the edge or the middle of the frond. Four species are natives of Britain, and are known by the common name of Duck-meal, Duck's-meal, or Duck-weed. See DUCK-WEED.

Lemnaceæ (lêm-nâ-sê-ê), n. pl. A nat. order of monocotyledons. They are floating plants, with lenticular or lobed leaves or fronds, bearing one or two monœcious flowers, in-Leguminosæ.

1. Papilionaceæ: a, Flower of the pea; s, Standard; w, Wings; k, Keel; s, Stamina, nine connected, one free; c, Legume, seeds fixed to the upper suture in one row. 2. Swartziaceæ: a, Flower of Swartzia grandiflora, with its single petal and hypogynous stamens; c, Calyx; e, Legume. 3. Cæsalpinieæ: a, Flower of Poinciana pulcherrima, showing its difform interior upper petal; c, Calyx; e, Legume. 4. Mimoseæ: a, One flower of common sensitive plant (Mimosa pudica), showing its regular corolla; b, Stamina, hypogynous; c, Legume exterior; d, Legume interior; e, Legume of Acacia arabica. A, Curved radicle, as in Papilionaceæ; B, Straight radicle, as in Swartziaceæ and Cæsalpinieæ.

sand species, which are dispersed throughout the world. They are trees, shrubs, or herbs, differing widely in habit, with stipulate, alternate (rarely opposite), pinnate, digitately compound or simple leaves, and axilclosed in a spathe, but so perianth. The typical genus is Lemna (which see). The order is also called Pistaceae, from Pistia, another of the principal genera. The genera are few in number, the order comprising in all only about two dozen species. Those belonging to the genus Pistia are found floating in ponds in warm climates. P. Stratiotes, from its appearance called in the West Indian water lettuce, propagates itself with great rapidity and frequently covers ponds and tanks with a close mantle of verdure.

Lemnian (lem'ni-an), a. Of or pertaining to Lemnos, an island in the Aegean Sea. Lemnian earth, a kind of subliming medicinal earth, of a fatty consistence and reddish colour, used in the same cases as bole. It has the external appearance of clay, with a smooth surface resembling agate, especially in recent fractures. It resembles lapidary like soap. It was originally found in Lemnos, but occurs also in Siberia, Russia, and India, resulting from decay of felspathic rocks, like kaolin, to which it is related. Called also Spilargide.

Lemniscate, Lemniscate (lem-nis-kat', lem-nis-kat'), n. [L. lemna, a ribbon. lemniscatus, adorned with ribbons.] In geometry, the name given to a curve of the fourth degree, having the form of the figure 8, with both parts symmetrical, generated by the point to which a tangent to an equilateral hyperbola meets the perpendicular on it drawn from the centre.

Lemniscate (lem-nis-kat'), n. (L., a ribbon.) 1 In one costume, a various-coloured wool len fillet or ribbon pendant at the back part of the head, from diadem, crown, &c. It was likewise attached to the hair as a mark of additional honour. 2 A term applied to the minute ribbon shaped appendages of the generative parts in Scimenhydrichia.

Lentiginous (len-tij'in-us), a. [L. lentigo, a freckle, from L. lens, lentis, a lentil.] Pertaining to lentigo; freckly; scurfy; furfuraceous.

Lentigo (len-tij'ō), n. [L.] In med. a freckly eruption on the skin.

Lentil (len'til), n. [Fr. lentille, from L. lens, lentis, a lentil.] A plant and its seed of the genus Ervum (E. lens, Linn.), belonging to the papilionaceous division of the nat. order Leguminosæ. It is an annual plant, rising with weak stalks about 18 inches. The seeds, which are contained in a pod, are round, flat, and a little convex in the middle. It is cultivated for fodder and for its seeds, from which revalenta arabica is prepared.

Lentiscus, Lentisk (len-tis'kus, len'tisk), n. [L. the mastich-tree.] A tree of the genus Pistacia, P. lentiscus (the mastich-tree), a native of Arabia, Persia, Syria, and the south of Europe. It belongs to the nat. order Anacardiaceæ. The wood is of a pale brown, and resinous and fragrant. See MASTICH.

Lentitude (len'ti-tüd), n. [L. lentus, slow.] Slowness.

Lentner, Lentiner (len'tnēr, len'ti-nēr), n. [From Lent, because taken during that season.] A kind of hawk. Iz. Walton.

Lento (len'tō), [It.] In music, a direction indicating that the music to which the word is prefixed is to be performed slowly.

Lenton, n. The season of Lent. Chaucer.

Lentor (len'tēr), n. [L. from lentus, slow, tough, clammy; Fr. lenteur.] 1. Tenacity; viscosity; viscosity, as of fluids. 'Their clamminess and lentor.' Evelyn.—2. Slowness; delay; sluggishness. 'The lentor of eruptions not inflammatory.' Arbuthnot.

Lentous (len'tūs), a. [L. lentus, slow, thick.] Viscid; viscous; tenacious. 'This spawn of a lentous and transparent body.' Sir T. Browne.

L'envoy, L'envoy (lăh-vvā), n. [Fr. See ENVOY.] 1. A sort of postscript appended to literary compositions, and serving either to recommend them to the attention of some particular person, or to enforce what we call the moral of them; an explanatory or commendatory postscript.

Moth. Is not l'envoy a salve?
Arm. No, page: it is an epilogue or discourse, to make plain Some obscure precedence that hath tofore been said. Shak.

2. A conclusion; a result.

Long since

I looked for this l'envoy. Massey.

Lenzinite (len'zin-it), n. [From Lenz, a German mineralogist.] A variety of halloysite, a mineral of two kinds, the opaline and argillaceous. It is a hydrous silicate of alumina, and occurs usually in small masses of the size of a nut.

Leo (lě'ō), n. [L.] The Lion, the fifth sign of the zodiac. It contains ninety-five stars: one of them, of the first magnitude, in the breast of the Lion, is called Regulus, and Cor Leonis or Lion's Heart. It is marked thus ♌.—Leo Minor, the Little Lion, a constellation of the northern hemisphere containing fifty-three stars.

Leonese (lě-o-nēr), a. Of or pertaining to Leon in Spain, or its inhabitants.

Leonhardt (lě-on-hărd't), n. [After Professor von Leonhardt.] A mineral, consisting chiefly of the hydrous silicate of alumina and lime, found in Hungary.

Leonides (lě-on'ī-dēs), n. pl. A name given to the group of meteors observed in the month of November each year, but occurring with extreme profusion about three times in a century: so called because they seem to radiate from the constellation Leo.

Leonine (lě'o-nĭn), a. [L. leoninus, from leo, lion.] Belonging to a lion; resembling a lion or partaking of his qualities; as, leonine fierceness or rapacity.

Leonina (lě'o-nĭn), n. A counterfeit copper coin of the reign of Edward I., worth about a halfpenny, coined abroad and smuggled into England: so called from bearing the figure of a lion.

Leonine (lě'o-nĭn), n. [From Leon or Leoninus, a canon of the order of St. Benedict in Paris in the twelfth century, who wrote largely in this measure.] A term applied to a certain Latin measure popular in the middle ages, consisting of hexameter and pentameter verses, rhyming at the middle and end. The following Latin version of 'The devil was sick,' &c., is a leonine couplet:—
Dremom languēbat, monachus tunc esse volēbat,
Ast ubi convalescit, mansit ut ante Dut.

Ovid practised this sort of versification, especially in his epistles; for example—Cultaque Orestes Taurica terra Dea.

Lines having a similar character are not rare in English poetry:—
From my wings are shaken the dews that waken
The sweet birds every one
When rocked to rest on their mother's breast,
As she dances about the sun. Shelley.

Leoninely (lě'o-nĭn-lĭ), adv. In a leonine manner; like a lion.

Leontodon (lě-on'tō-don), n. [Gr. leōn, leontos, a lion, and odontos, odontos, a tooth—in reference to the tooth-like divisions of the leaves.] A genus of plants of the nat. order Compositæ; lion's-tooth. As now defined it includes about forty species, several of which were formerly placed in separate genera. They are perennial (rarely annual) herbs, with entire or pinnate leafless leaves, simple or sparingly branched leafless scapes, and yellow flowers. They are natives of Europe, Central and Western Asia, and Northern Africa, one (L. autumnale) being naturalized in North America.

Leonurus (lě-o-nū-rus), n. [Gr. leōn, a lion, and oura, a tail—in allusion to the appearance of the spike of flowers.] A genus of plants of the nat. order Labiata. It includes about ten species, natives of Europe and extra-tropical Asia, one (L. Carduica) having spread throughout the world. They are erect herbs, with cut or lobed leaves, which are longer than the dense axillary whorls of sessile red or whitish flowers. L. Carduica (the common motherwort) is more or less naturalized in Britain, growing in hedges and waste places.

Leopard (lep'ărd), n. [L. leo, lion, and pardus, a panther.] A carnivorous digitigrade mammal belonging to the genus Felis. It inhabits Central Africa, Persia, China, and India. The general colour of the leopard is yellowish brown, which grows paler in the sides till it merges into the white of the under part of the body. Over the head, neck, back, and flanks are scattered black spots of various sizes, while the sides are covered with numerous rose-shaped spots. The common leopard is the Felis leopardus; the hunting leopard or cheetah, the Felis jubata, a useful and docile species which inhabits the greater part both of Asia and Africa. (See CHEETAH.) Some naturalists regard the panther and leopard as varieties of the same species; others, following Cuvier, regard them as different species, designating the panther Felis pardus.

Leopard's-bane (leopard's-ban), n. The English popular name of Doronicum pinnatifidum, nat. order Compositae. It is a robust plant, with large roughish leaves and conspicuous yellow flower heads. It is said to have been used formerly to destroy leopards, wolves, and other wild animals.

Leopard-wood (leopard wood), n. The wood of Bromelia Aubletia. Also said to be applied to a fancy wood of the palm tribe.

Leopard, 'Leopard, 'a. A leopard. Chamaeleon.

Lepididae (le-pid'-id), n. pl. The barnacles or goose-muscles, a family of cirriped crustaceans, free-swimming when in the larva state, but when adult attached by the anlagen to submarine bodies. The antennae become developed into a long flexible muscular peduncle, bearing at its free end a calcareous shell, usually of five valves, which protects the principal organs and opens at will to admit of the protrusion of jointed and ciliated rudimentary limbs or tentacles, having near the base slender processes homologous with the gills of higher crustaceans. The Lepididae are mostly hermaphrodites, but in some species the animal of the normal form is strictly female, having one or more males of minute size and more simple organization lodged inside its shell. In others which, though hermaphrodites, have the male organs less developed than the female, similar males are met with, and are termed complementary males.

Lepidite (lep'-id-ite), n. [L. lepus, Gr. lepus, a kind of shell-fish.] The barnacle, one of the Lepididae (which see).

Lepidogaster (lep'-id-og-as-ter), n. [Gr. lepus, lepus, a limpet, and gaster, the belly.] A genus of small acanthopterygian fishes which have the power of attaching themselves to rocks and other hard substances by means of a disk or sucker formed by the modification of the pectoral fins.

Lepal (lep'al), n. In bot. a barren transformed stamen.

Lepus (lep-us), n. [L. and Gr. a limpet.] A genus of cirripedes, of which the barnacle (L. gaster) is an example. They adhere in clusters to rocks, shells, floating wood, &c. See LEPAIDIDE.

Lepus (lep-us), n. Originally and properly lepus, from Fr. lepre, lepreux, L. lepro, from Gr. lepro, leprosy, from lepro, scaly, lepro, a hump. A person affected with leprosy. Lev. xiii. 45.

Leprosy (lep'-er-ee), a. Affected with leprosy.

Leprosus (lep'-er-us), a. Leprosus, coming leprosy.

In the position of my ears did pass
The leprosy distillations. Shaks.

Lepid (lep'id), a. [L. lepidus, pleasant.] Pleasant, jocund.

Lepidoderm (le-pid'-id-erm), n. [L. or lepidon, from lepis, lepidus, a scale.] An extensive genus of herbs or underbrush of the nat. order Cruciferae. They are simple or usually branched, of varied habit, with small recumbent or white (very rarely yellow) flowers. About sixty to eighty species are recognized, natives of warm and temperate regions throughout the world, none being alpine or arctic. L. sativum is the common garden-cress.

Lepidodendron (lep'id-od-en-dron), n. [Gr. lepis, a shell, rind, or scale, and dendron, a tree.] An extinct genus of fossil plants of very frequent occurrence in the coal formation. The species are sometimes found of enormous size, fragments of stems occurring upwards of 40 feet in length. Their internal structure is intermediate between Conifers and Lycopodiaceae. They preserve throughout the whole extent of the trunk the scars formed by the attachment of the petioles or leaf stalks.

Lepidoganoide (lep'id-og-an-oid), n. A fish of the sub-order Lepidoganoidei.

Lepidoganoidei (lep'id-og-an-oid-ee), a. Of or belonging to the Lepidoganoidei.

Lepidoganoidei (lep'id-og-an-oid-ee), n. pl. [Gr. lepis, lepidus, a scale, genus, splendour, and gano, resemblance.] A sub-order of ganoid fishes, distinguished from the placoganoide fishes by their external covering consisting of scales, and not, as in the latter, of plates. The best known living fishes belonging to the Lepidoganoidei are the bony pike and the polypterus. The fossil lepidoganoide begin to appear in the old red sandstone epoch, and are largely represented in the upper palaeozoic strata.

Lepidogaster (lep'id-og-as-ter), n. Same as Lepidogaster.

Lepidoid (lep'id-oid), n. [Gr. lepis, a scale, and oides, form, shape, appearance.] One of the Lepidoidae, a family of extinct fossil fishes.

Lepidoidae (lep'id-oid-ee), n. pl. A family of extinct fossil fishes, found in the oolitic series, as also in the trias and carboniferous. The family was remarkable for its large rhomboidal bony ganoid scales, of great thickness, and covered with enamel.

Lepidolite (lep'id-ol-ite), n. [Gr. lepis, lepidus, a scale, and lithos, a stone.] A mineral found in acly masses, ordinarily of a violet or lilac colour, allied to mica. Lepidolite is of a peach-blossom red colour, sometimes gray, massive and in small concretions.

Lepidoptera (lep'id-op-ter-ee), n. pl. [Gr. lepis, a scale, and pteron, a wing.] The most beautiful of all the orders of insects, a. Butterfly—Hesperia gaudetia, marked white butterfly. b. Hawk moth or sphinx—Xanthopan stricklandi, burning bird hawk moth. c. Moth—Drimys griseodactyla, magpie moth. d. Night and day moth of butterfly. e. Anemone—f. Butterfly, a. Sphinx's, c. Moth's, d. Portion of wing of cabbage-butterfly, with part of the scales removed. 7. Scales of do. magnified.

comprising the butterflies and moths. From the former being active by day, and the latter mostly towards twilight or at night, the butterflies are known as the diurnal, the moths as the eryctuscular or nocturnal divisions. All have four membranous wings, covered more or less completely with modified hairs or scales. The mouth is entirely suctorial, the maxilla being converted into a tube, and the mandibles rudimentary. The metamorphosis is complete. The larvae are termed caterpillars, and are provided with masticatory organs fitted for dividing solid substances. They possess three legs in addition to the three pairs proper to the adult, and have attached to the upper lip a tubular organ or spinneret, by which silken threads can be manufactured.

Lepidopteral, Lepidopterous (lep'id-op-ter-al, lep'id-op-ter-us), a. Of or belonging to the Lepidoptera.

Lepidoderm (lep'id-od-er-m), n. [Gr. lepis, lepidus, a scale, and derma, a skin.] A genus of fishes forming the order Dipnoi: the mud-fish. There are two species, the L. paradoxus and the L. annectans, the former found in the large intertropical rivers of Western Africa, the latter in the Amazon and other rivers of South America. During the dry season they lie packed in the mud of their native rivers, the peculiar nature of their respiratory organs enabling them to support this mode of existence. See DIPODI.

Lepidoste (lep-id-oste), n. [Gr. lepis, lepidus, a scale.] A word. An effluorescence of scales over different parts of the body. Called also Scale-obs.

Lepidosteidae (lep'id-ost-ee-id-ee), n. pl. [See Lepidosteidae.] A small family of ganoid fishes containing few species and only one genus, Lepidosteus (which see).

Lepidosteus (lep-id-ost-ee-us), n. [Gr. lepis, lepidus, a scale, and steos, a bone.] A genus of fishes with bony polished or ganoid scales, and hence known by the name of bony-pikes. This genus belongs to the family Lepidosteidae and order Ganoidae, of which it is one of the few living representatives. They are only found in North America, and resemble many of the ancient fossil genera more than any other living fishes.

Lepidote, Lepidote (lep-id-ote, lep-id-ote), n. [Gr. lepidon, scaly, from lepis, a scale.] In bot. covered with scurfy rusty spots, leprosy.

Lepidoteum (lep-id-ote-um), n. pl. [From Lepidoteum.] A synonym of Lepidoteum.

Lepidotus (lep-id-ot-us), n. [Gr. lepis, lepidus, a scale.] A fossil fish of the Waiden formation, characterized by large, thick, rhomboidal, enamelled scales, and hemispherical or obtusely conical teeth.

Lepus (lep-us), n. [Gr. lepis, a scale.] In bot. a thin flat membranous process or scale, attached by its middle, and having a inserted irregular margin, such as covers the foliage of the cleaster.

Lepismidae (le-pis-mid-ee), n. pl. [Gr. lepis, a hump, and oides, resemblance.] A family of wingless insects, belonging to the order Thysanura, having the abdomen fringed with a series of movable appendages, which assist the legs in locomotion, and furnished at its extremity with three caudal bristles, which are used in leaping. It includes the genera Lepisma proper and Macchia. Brands.

Leposid (lep-id-ee), n. pl. [L. lepus, lepus, a hare and Gr. oides, resemblance.] The hare tribe, or the family of rodents of which the genus Lepus is the type. The dentition is very peculiar, there being four upper incisors, two of these being small ones, situated immediately behind the normal pair.

Leposine (lep'-er-in or lep'-ur-in), a. [L. leporinus, from lepus, a hare.] Pertaining to a hare, having the nature or qualities of the hare.

Leprosy (lep'-er-ee), pp. Leaped. Spenser.

Leprosia (le-pri-ee), n. [L. lepro, leprosy, the plants on which the species grow appearing as if affected with leprosy.] A former generic term for lichens in which the crust is broken up into a dusty mass, occasionally mixed with a few threads. The yellow powdery and white patches on the oak are examples.

Leprosus (lep'-er-us), a. In bot. having a scurfy appearance.

Leprosy (lep'-er-ee), n. The state of being leprosy.

Leprosy (lep'-er-ee), n. [O. Fr. leprose, See Leprosy.] A name given to several different diseases. Elephantiasis is sometimes called Arabic leprosy. Regarding the leprosy of the Jews nothing certain is known. The term was probably applied to various inveterate cutaneous diseases, especially those of a chronic or contagious order. The name is now frequently restricted by medical writers to the Greek or tubercular leprosy which prevailed during the middle ages, and is still met with in Iceland, the Orkney and Shetland Islands, Norway and Sweden, as well as in Africa, the East and West Indies, and many tropical islands. The disease is characterized by dusky red or livid tubercles of various sizes on the face, ears, and extremities; thickened or rugose state of the skin, with loss of its sensibility, falling off of the hair, excepting that of the scalp; hoarse, nasal, or lost voice; ozena, ulcerations of the surface, and extreme fetor; while in some severe cases the fingers and toes drop off. The causes of this disease are uncertain, but poor living, uncleanness, disease of salt, and exposure to cold and damp are its constant attendants. Its cure is always uncertain, and, in advanced cases, improbable.

Leprous (lep'rus), a. [L. leprosus; Fr. lépreux. See LEPER.] 1. Infected with leprosy; covered with white scales.

His hand was leprous as snow. Ex. iv. 6.

2. In bot. covered with a sort of scurfiness, as crustaceous lichens; lepidote.

Leproully (lep'rus-ly), adv. In a leprous manner.

Leprouness (lep'rus-ness), n. The state of being leprous.

Leptocardii (lep'to-kär-di-i), n. pl. [Gr. leptos, slender, and kardia, the heart.] The name given by Müller to the order of fishes comprising the lancelet, now called Pharyngobranchii.

Leptodactyl, Leptodactyle (lep-tō-dak'til), n. [Gr. leptos, slender, and daktylos, a toe.] A bird or other animal having slender toes.

Leptodactylous (lep-tō-dak'til-us), a. [Gr. leptos, slender, and daktylos, a finger.] Having slender toes.

Leptolepis (lep-to-le-pis), n. [Gr. leptos, smooth, and lepis, a scale.] A genus of small saurians fossil fishes found in the lias and oolite.

Leptology (lep-to-lo-jī), n. [Gr. leptologia—leptos, small, and logos, discourse.] A minute and tedious discourse on trifling things.

Leptospermum (lep-tō-spēr-mum), n. [Gr. leptos, smooth, and sperma, seed.] A large genus of New Zealand and Australian trees and shrubs of the nat. order Myrtaceæ. They have small leathery dotted leaves and white flowers. Captain Cook's crew used the leaves of L. lanigerum for tea, and they are said to improve the flavour of beer.

Lepus (lē'pus), n. [L., a hare.] 1. A genus of rodents, comprising the hare and rabbit. See HARE, RABBIT.—2. In astron. the Hare, a southern constellation containing nineteen stars. It is situated directly under Orion.

Leret (lér), a. Empty. See LEER.

Lernæadæ (lér-né-a-dé), n. pl. A group of parasitic suctorial crustaceans, of the order Ichthyophthira or fish-lice, having the mouth armed with piercing mandibles, and the feet, jaws, and true legs undeveloped, found attached to fishes. Some species penetrate the skin, and feed on the viscera. The typical genus is Lernæa.

Lernæan, Lernæan (lér-né-an), n. An individual of the genus Lernæa.

Lerot (lér-ot), n. [Fr. dim. from loir, a dormouse, from L. glis, gliris, a dormouse.] A name of the garden dormouse (Myoxus nictela), a little rodent which makes great havoc among fruit. It hibernates in winter, six or seven crowding into one cell.

Lese, t. n. A leash. Chaucer.

Lese, t. a. [A. Sax. lēas, false.] False; lying. Chaucer.

Lese, t. v. t. To lose. Chaucer.

Lese Majesty (lēz' maj'es-ti), n. See LEZE MAJESTY.

Lesion (lē'zhon), n. [L. læsio, from lædo, to hurt.] 1. A hurting; hurt; wound; injury. 2. In Scots law, the degree of harm or injury done to the interests of a minor, or of a person of weak capacity, necessary to entitle him to reduce or set aside the deed by which he has suffered.—3. In pathol. derangement; disorder; any morbid change, either in the exercise of functions or in the texture of organs.

Less (les). For Unless. R. Jonson.

-Less (les). A terminating syllable appended to many nouns, and thus forming adjectives, is the A. Sax. -læsa, Goth. -laus, Icel. -laus, O. Sax. -lōs, O. H. G. -lōs, -lōs, signifying literally loose from, and allied to the A. Sax. lȳsan, lōsan, E. lose. It forms adjectives denoting destitute of, void of, wanting; as, a witless man, a man destitute of wit; childless, without children; fatherless; faithless; penniless; lawless; &c.

Less (les), a. [O. E. lesse, læsa, A. Sax. læs, læssa (for læstra). Allied to Goth. laivos, weak (comp. lazy); the superl. least is a contracted form of A. Sax. læstist, læsest. Little, which serves as the positive, is from a different root.] Smaller; not so large or great; as, a less quantity or number; a horse of less size or value; we are all destined to suffer affliction in a greater or less degree.

Less (les), adv. In a smaller or lower degree; as, less bright or loud; less beautiful; less obliging; less careful; the less a man praises himself the more disposed are others to praise him.

Less (les), n. 1. Not so much; a quantity not so great as another quantity; anything below a certain standard; as, he said he would have all his rights and honours, and would not be contented with less.

And the children of Israel did so, and gathered, some more, some less. Ex. xvi. 17.

2. A younger; an inferior.

The less is blessed of the better. Heb. vii. 7.

—No less, nothing of inferior consequence or moment; nothing else.

He is no less than what we say he is. Shak.

Look for no less than death. Shak.

Less (les), v. t. To make less. Gower.

Lessee (les-sé), n. [From lease.] The person to whom a lease is given, or who takes an estate by lease.

Lessen (les'n), v. t. 1. To make less; to diminish; to reduce in size, number, degree, state, or quality; as, to lessen a kingdom or its population; awkward manners tend to lessen our respect for men of merit.—2. To degrade; to reduce in dignity; to depreciate; to disparage.

St. Paul chose to magnify his office when ill men conspired to lessen it. Atterbury.

Lessen (les'n), v. i. To become less; to shrink; to contract in bulk, quantity, number, or amount; to become less in degree; to decrease; to diminish. 'Listen to the lessening music.' Tennyson.

Lesser (les'ér), a. [A. double compar. from less.] Less; smaller.

By the same reason may a man in the state of nature punish the lesser branches of that law. Locke.

God made . . . the lesser light to rule the night. Gen. i. 16.

[The use of this form of the comparative of little is not so common as that of the form less, but it is almost uniform after the definite article, and in antithesis to greater as well as in certain special instances; as, in Lesser Asia.]

Lesser (les'ér), adv. Less.

Some say he's mad; others that lesser hate him. Do call it valiant fury. Shak.

Lessee (les'éz), n. [Fr. laissées, lit. leaveings, from laisser, to leave.] In hunting, the ordure or excrement of the boar, wolf, and bear.

Lesson (les'n), n. [Fr. leçon; L. lectio, lectionis, from L. lego, lectum, to pick up, gather, or collect, to read.] 1. Anything read or recited to a teacher by a pupil or learner, or such a portion of a book as is assigned by a preceptor to a pupil to be learned at one time; something to be learned.—2. Instruction conveyed to a pupil at one time; as, to receive twelve lessons in music; a half-hour lesson on the piano.—3. Anything learned or that may be learned from experience.

O learn to love; the lesson is but plain. Shak.

4. A portion of Scripture read in divine service; as, here endeth the first lesson.—5. Precept; doctrine or notion inculcated.

Be not jealous over the wife of thy bosom, and teach her not an evil lesson against herself. Eccus. ix. 1.

6. Severe lecture; reproof; rebuke.

She would give her a lesson for walking so late. Sir J. Sidney.

7. A musical composition written as an exercise for an instrument.

Those good laws were like good lessons set for a flute out of tune. Sir J. Davies.

Lesson (les'n), v. t. To teach; to instruct.

Children should be seasoned betimes, and lessened into a contempt and detestation of this vice. Sir R. E. Estrange.

Lessor (les-sor), n. [From lease.] One who leases; the person who lets to a tenant for a term of years, or gives a lease.

Least (lest), conj. [O. E. lēste, lēste, for les the, shortened from A. Sax. thys lēst the, the less that, lest—thys, by that—the in the more.

&c., less=less, the, indeclinable relative.] For fear that; in case; that . . . not.

Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. Gen. iii. 3.

Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. Jn. v. 14.

Lest (lest), v. i. To listen. Spenser.

Lest, t. n. [A form of lust.] Pleasure. Chaucer.

Leste, t. v. i. To list; to please; generally used as an impersonal.

Leste, t. a. Last. Chaucer.

Leste, t. a. superl. Least. Chaucer.

Lestris (les'tris), n. [Gr. læstris, piratical, from læstēs, a robber, pirate.] A genus of palmed birds, distinguished from the true gulls by their membranous nostrils being larger, and opening nearer to the point and edge of the beak; the tail is also pointed. The L. parasiticus is the arctic gull, and the L. catarrhactes the skua gull, the most formidable of all the gull kind. They both force gulls and other sea-birds to give up their prey; hence their name.

Let (let), v. t. pret. & pp. let; ppr. letting. [Common to the Teutonic languages, and originally with reduplicated preterite. A. Sax. lētan, lētan, pret. lēot, lēot, for lēiōt (Goth. lailōt); D. laeten, Icel. lēta, Goth. lēitan, lēitan, G. lassen, to let, to permit, to let go, set free; allied to E. late, and probably to L. lassus, weary, exhausted.] 1. To permit; to allow; to suffer; to give leave or power by a positive act, or negatively to withhold restraint; not to prevent; as, a leaky ship lets water enter into the hold. Let is now always followed by the infinitive without the sign to; and the examples of its use with the infinitive preceded by to are rare even in older English.

Pharaoh said, I will let you go. Ex. viii. 28.

When the ship was caught and could not bear up into the wind, we let her drive. Acts xxvii. 15.

2. To cause; to make.

There's a letter for you, sir . . . if your name be Horatio, as I am let to know it is. Shak.

[In this sense the word let is pretty common in Old English with the infinitive not preceded by to, in constructions similar to those in which do is used with the infinitive in modern English. Thus Chaucer has—

For which this noble Thebes anon

Let senden after noble Palamon; where let senden is equivalent to did send. See Abbott's Shakespearean Grammar, § 303.]

3. To lease; to grant possession and use for a compensation; as, to let an estate for a year; to let a house to a tenant; to let a room to lodgers; often followed by out; but the out is unnecessary.—4. To give out, as any work to be performed at a fixed rate; as, to let the works on a railway.—5. In the imperative mood, let has the following uses. (a) Followed by the first and third persons it expresses desire or wish; hence it is used in prayer and entreaty to superiors, and to those who have us in their power; as, let me not wander from thy commandments. Ps. cxix. 10. (b) Followed by the first person plural, let expresses exhortation or entreaty; as, rise, let us go. (c) Followed by the third person, it implies permission, desire, command, or concession, addressed to an inferior; as, let him go; let them remain.

Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear. Gen. i. 9.

O'er golden sands let rich Pactolus flow. Pope.

—To let alone, to leave; to suffer to remain without intermeddling; as, let alone this idle project; let me alone. Adverbially used in the sense of not to take into account; not to mention. [Colloq. or vulgar.]

He's worth a shilling a day; let alone the arrands. Dickens.

I wouldn't turn out a badger to you, let alone a man. Dickens.

—To let be, to suffer to be as at present; to suffer to go or to cease; to let alone.—To let blood, to open a vein and suffer the blood to flow out.—To let down, (a) to permit to sink or fall; to lower.

She let them down by a cord through the window. Josh. ii. 15.

(b) To soften in tempering, as tools, cutlery, &c.—To let drive or let fly, to send forth or discharge with violence, as an arrow, stone, &c.—To let go, to allow or suffer to go; to release from confinement; to relax hold of anything; often, by a vulgar corruption, with of.

'Don't,' cried Oliver, struggling. 'Let go of me.' Dickens.

—To let in or into, (a) to permit or suffer to enter; to admit; as, open the door, let in try friend, we are not let into the secrets of the cabinet. (b) To place in as an insertion. (c) To cheat. Halfhearted. To let loose, to free from restraint to permit to wander at large. To let off, (a) to allow to escape, to release, as from a penalty or an engagement. (b) To discharge, as an arrow, to fire, as a gun. To let out, (a) to suffer to escape. (b) To loosen, to extend, to enlarge, as, to let out a rope (by allowing it to slip), to let out a sail or a garment. (c) To lease or let to hire. (d) To give on contract. See above def. 4. To let slide, to let alone, not to mind, to pay no more attention to.

Let the world slide away! Shak.

-To let slip, to let go, to let loose, to omit, to lose by negligence. -Let that free stick to the wall, let that alone, say nothing about that. [Scotch] -To let well alone, to forbear trying to improve that which is already in a satisfactory condition, to leave matters as they are.

Let (let), v. i. 1. To forbear, to leave off.

Thar can be bounden to his observance.

For Cuthbert wold be doted on his will. Chaucer.

We hope a whittier anxiety did not stir

To praise the clear unclouded red and white. Shak.

2. To be offered for hire, as, a house to let. To yield a certain rent by being hired out, as, this house lets for $20 a year. To let in, to leak; to admit water. To let out, to make a disclosure, to betray knowledge, as, don't let on about that, that is, don't mention it. [Scotch and American].

Let (let), n. A letting for hire.

The two couch house gets a better let, we like here cheap.

Let (let), v. i. pret. & pp. letted; pp. letting [A. Sax. lettan, to delay, to hinder, from let, late, comp. hindere, from hind] To retard, to hinder, to impede, to interpose obstructions to.

Many secret wounds be hardly whole.

And let the team the middle. Trappam.

For his own good, a careless letter-go. Spencer

Letter (let'er), n. One who lets, retards, or hinders.

Letter (let'er), n. [Fr. lettre, L. littera, from lino, linum, to banner, an early mode of writing being by graving the characters upon tablets smeared over with wax. See LETTUR.] 1. A mark or character written, printed, engraved, or painted, used as the representative of a sound, or of an articulation of the organs of speech. 2. A written or printed message, an epistle, a communication made by visible characters from one person to another at a distance.

I have a letter from her

Of such contents as you will wonder at. Shak.

3. Neither more nor less than what words literally express. Literal or verbal meaning.

We must observe the letter of the law without doing violence to the reason of the law, and the business of the legislator. For Taylor

Break the letter of it to keep the sense. Trappam

4. In printing a single type or character, also types collectively, as, plenty of letter, scarcity of letter. 5. pl. Learning; erudition, as, a man of letters. 6. In the flowery walk of letters. Trappam. -Letter of attorney. See ATTORNEY. -Letter of credence. See CREDENCE. 7. -Letter of credit. See CREDIT. -Letter of Marque. See MANQUE. -Signal letter. See SIGNAL. -Dead letter. See DEAD LETTER. -Letter de course, in law, close letters, being usually closed or sealed up with the royal signet or privy seal. -Letter patent or seal, a writing executed and sealed, by which power and authority are granted to a person to do some act or enjoy some right. To run one's letters, in Saxo law, to apply, as a prisoner, for trial at the Court of Justiciary, in cases when such trial could be brought on in that court before the circuit court sits in the locality in which he is imprisoned.

Letter (let'er), v. t. To impress or form letters on; as, to letter a book; a book gilt and lettered.

Letter-board (let'er bôrd), n. In printing, a board on which pages of types are placed for distribution, and also when they are not immediately wanted.

Letter-book (let'er buk), n. A book in which a business man inserts copies of letters despatched by him.

Letter-box (let'er boks), n. A box for receiving letters, a post-office box.

Letter-carrier (let'er-kar-i-er), n. A man who carries about and delivers letters; a postman.

Letter-case (let'er-kâs), n. 1. A case for containing letters or epistles. 2. In printing, a case of letters or types.

Letter-clip (let'er klip), n. A contrivance, generally in the form of a spring-clip, for keeping letters or papers fast together.

Letter-cutter (let'er-kut-er), n. One who cuts types.

Lettered (let'er-d), a. 1. Litterate, educated, versed in literature or sciences. "Lettered Rabbins." Prose 2. Belonging to learning; containing letters; as, a lettered retirement.

Lettered case, n. A furnished, marked, or designated with letters, as, a lettered suit or illustration.

Letter-founder (let'er found-er), n. One who casts letters, a type-founder.

Letter-foundry (let'er found-ry), n. A place where types are cast.

Lettering (let'er-ing), n. 1. The act of impressing letters. 2. The letters impressed or formed upon anything.

tion on which the lock has been set.

Letters (let'erz), n. See LETTERS.

Letter-office (let'er-of-is), n. A place where letters are deposited and from which they are distributed.

Letter-paper (let'er-pâ-pér), n. Paper for writing letters on.

Letterpress (let'er-pres), n. 1. Letters and words impressed on paper or other material by types, print. 2. Same as Copping-machine.

Letterpress (let'er-pres), a. Consisting of, relating to, or employed in, type-printing; as, a letterpress printer; letterpress printing.

Letter-sorter (let'er-sort-er), n. An assistant in a post-office who is engaged in arranging letters.

Letter-wood (let'er-wud), n. The heart-wood of a tree of the genus Broomum (B. dubia), belonging to the broad fruit family (Artocarpacae), and a native of Otaheite. It is extremely hard, of a beautiful brown colour with black spots, which have been compared to hieroglyphics, hence the name. It is used in cabinet-work for veneering only, its scarcity and costliness making it an article of rare and limited application.

Letter-writer (let'er-rit-er), n. One who writes letters a book which teaches the proper modes of writing letters, an instrument for copying letters.

Letting (let'ing), n. Same as Letting.

Letting-cap (let'ing-kap), n. [Probably a form of letting-cap, lettings being a mild euphoric and analgesic.] A euphoric in which lettuce was probably a leading ingredient.

Bring in the lettuce, you must be shaved, etc.

And then how suddenly we'd make you sleep. Don & Pl.

Lettice-cap (let'is-kap), n. [Comp. O. Fr. letice, a gray fur.] A kind of cap.

A lettuce-cap is worn and heard not about.

Shakespeare (1598)

Lettish, Lettic (let'ish, let'ik), a. Of or pertaining to the Letts, or natives or inhabitants of Livonia.

Lettish, Lettic (let'ish, let'ik), n. The language spoken by the people of Livonia, originally a Slavonian branch of the Aryan family of tongues.

Lettre-de-cachet (let-r-de-ka-shä), See CACHET.

Lettuce (let'is), n. [A Sax. lactuce, G. lattich, D. lattus, Fr. laitue, from L. lactuca, a lettuce, from lac, lactis, milk.] The English popular name of several species of Lactuca, some of which are used as salads. See LACTUCA.

Leucadendron (lü-ka-den'dron), n. [Gr. leukos, white, and dendron, a tree—in allusion to the white leaves.] A genus containing between forty and fifty species of trees and shrubs, with handsome silky silvery entire, mostly sessile leaves, and heads of yellowish dioecious flowers, nat. order Proteaceae, natives of the Cape of Good Hope. L. argenteum is the silver-tree, the silvery leaves of which are much used in Christmas decorations.

Leucin, Leucine (lü'sin), n. [Gr. leukos, white.] (C₆H₁₂NO₃) A white pulverulent substance obtained by treating muscular fibre with sulphuric acid, and afterwards with alcohol. It crystallizes in shining scales.

Leuciscus (lü-sis'kus), n. [Gr. leukiskos, the white mullet.] A genus of fishes of the family Cyprinidae. It contains numerous species, of which the roach, dace, and bleak afford familiar examples.

Leucite (lü'sit), n. [Gr. leukos, white.] A mineral, so called from its whiteness, found among volcanic products in Italy, especially at Vesuvius, disseminated through the lavas in crystals or in irregular masses. It is a silicate of alumina and potassium.

Leucitic (lü-sit'ik), a. Of or pertaining to, containing, or resembling leucite.

Leucitoid (lü'si-toid), a. In crystal, the trapezohedron; so called as being the form of the mineral leucite.

Leucobryaces (lü-kö-bri-ä'sé-ö), n. pl. [Gr. leukos, white, and bryon, an alga.] A family of operculate mosses arranged among the Acrocarpi, but exhibiting also lateral fruit-stalks. There is only one British genus.

Leucocythæmia, Leucocythemia (lü-kö-si-thé-mi-a), n. [Gr. leukos, white, kytos, a cell, and haima, blood.] In med. a disease in which the blood presents a great increase of the white corpuscles, the spleen and lymphatic glands being at the same time increased.

Leucothiopic (lü-ké-thi-op'ik), a. Pertaining to a leucothiops or albino; pertaining to leucopathy.

Leuco-ethiopic (lü-kö-é-thi-op'ik), a. Same as Leucothiopic.

Leucothiops (lü-ké-thi-op-s), n. pl. Leucothiopes (lü-ké-thi-op-éz), [Gr. leukos, white, and aitiops, an Ethiop or black.] An albino or individual affected with a want of colouring matter in the skin and cuticular appendages.

Leucojum, Leucoum (lü-kö'jum, lö-kö'i-um), n. [Gr. leukos, white, and ion, a violet, in reference to the colour of the flower, whence the English name snowflake.] A genus of European bulbous plants, nat. order Amaryllidaceae. They are very like snowdrops, but the six perianth-segments are nearly equal. L. æstivum is a British species commonly known by the name of snowflake.

Leucol, Lencoline (lü-kol, lö-kol-in), n. (C₂H₃N.) An organic base obtained from coal-tar, isomeric with chinoline.

Leucoma (lü-kö'ma), n. [L. from leukos, white.] A white opacity of the cornea of the eye, the result of acute inflammation. Called also Albugo.

Leucopathy, Lencopathia (lü-kop'a-thi, lö-kö-path'i-a), n. [Gr. leukos, white, and pathos, affection.] The condition of an albino; albinism.

Leucophane (lü-kö-fän), n. [Gr. leukos, white, and phaino, to appear.] A mineral occurring imperfectly crystallized, of a pale greenish or wine-yellow colour, consisting of silica, fluoric acid, glucina, lime, and sodium. It is found in Norway.

Leucophasia (lü-kö-fä-si-a), n. A genus of white butterflies. L. sinapis, or wood-white butterfly, is a native of Britain.

Leucophlegmacy (lü-kö-fleg'ma-si), n. [Gr. leukophlegmatia—leukos, white, and phlegma, phlegm.] A tendency to a dropical state known by paleness, flabbiness, or redundancy of serum in the blood.

Leucophlegmatic (lü-kö-fleg-mat'ik), a. Pertaining to leucophlegmacy; having a dropical habit of body with an unnaturally pale complexion.

Leucopetrian (lü-kop-té-ri-an), n. In eccles. hist. one of a sect of the Greek Church charged with the errors of the Origenists, and with corrupting the text of the Gospel.

Leucopyrite (lü-kop'i-rit), n. [Gr. leukos, white, and E. pyrites.] A mineral of a colour between white and steel-gray, of a metallic lustre, consisting chiefly of arsenic and iron.

Leucorrhœa (lü-ko-ré'a), n. [Gr. leukos, and rhœo, to flow.] In med. a morbid discharge of a white, yellowish, or greenish mucus from the female genital organs; fluor albus; the whites.

Leucosiada (lü-kö-si-a-dé), n. pl. A family of short-tailed decapodous crustaceans, containing many pretty, round, porcellane, exotic crabs.

Leucostine (lü-kos'tin), n. [Gr. leukos, white.] A variety of trachyte.

Leucous (lü'kus), a. [Fr. leukos, white.] White: applied specifically to albinos.

Leugh, Leuch (lyuch or lyöch), pret. of lauch. Laughed. [Scotch.]

How graceless Ham leugh at his dad,
Which made Canaan a nigr. Burns.

Levant (lev'ant), a. [Fr. levant, rising, sunrise, from lever, L. levo, to make light, to raise. In the extract below, Milton, using levant and ponent as correlative terms, directly borrows from the It. levante, east, east wind, and ponente, west, west wind.] 1. † Eastern; coming from the direction in which the sun rises.

Forth rush the levant and the ponent winds, Eurus and Zephyr. Milton.

2. In geol. the name ('sunrise') given by Professor H. Rogers to the fourth of his fifteen divisions of the paleozoic strata in the Appalachian chain, the names of which suggest metaphorically the different natural periods of the day; it corresponds to a certain extent with our lower Silurians.—Levant and couchant, in lavo, see COUCHANT.

Levant (lé-vant'), n. [It. levante, the east, the east wind. See the adjective.] 1. A name given somewhat loosely to the countries, or more especially the maritime parts of the countries, lying on the eastern portion of the Mediterranean and its contiguous waters, as Turkey, Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, Egypt, &c.—2. An easterly wind blowing up the Mediterranean; a levanter. Levant (lé-vant'), v. i. [Sp. levantar, to raise, to move, to remove; levantar la casa, means to break up house; levantar el campo, to break up camp; to decamp—from L. levare, to raise.] To run away; to decamp.

Her unfortunate affliction precluded her from all hope of levanting with a lover. Trollope.

Levant (lé-vant'), n. A land-spring. [Local.] 'Landsprings which we call levants.' Gilbert White.

Levanter (lé-vant'ér), n. The name given to an easterly wind blowing up the Mediterranean from the direction of the Levant.

Violent Levanters which the learned among us say ought to be the Euroclydon which drove St. Paul to Malta. W. H. Russell.

Levanter (lé-vant'ér), n. One who levants; one who bets at a horse-race, and runs away without paying the wager lost; any one who runs away disgracefully. [Slang.]

Levantine (lé-vant'in or lev'an-tin), a. 1. Pertaining to the Levant. 'The Levantine churches.' Spencer.—2. Designating a particular kind of silk cloth.

Levantine (lé-vant'in or lev'an-tin), n. 1. A native or inhabitant of the Levant.—2. A vessel belonging to the Levant.—3. A particular kind of silk cloth.

Levari facias (lé-vä'ri fä'shi-as), n. [L. that you cause to be levied.] In lavo, a writ of execution executed by the sheriff for levying money upon the goods and lands of another. It issues from the county court and other inferior courts, except when money due for taxes, upon recognizances, &c., is to be levied, in which case it issues from the exchequer. This writ, except in the case of outlawry, has been completely superseded by the writ of elegit.

Levation (lé-vä'shon), n. [L. levatio, levationis, from levo, to raise.] The act of raising; elevation. Sir T. More.

Levator (lé-vä'tér), n. [L. from levo, to raise.] 1. In anat. a name applied to many muscles, such as raise the lips, eyelids, eye, soft palate, shoulder-blade, &c.—2. A surgical instrument used to raise a depressed part of the skull.

Leve (lév), v. t. To believe.

Leve (lév), v. i. To live.

Leve, † a. [See LIEVE.] Dear; beloved.

Levecel, Levesell, † n. [Written also Lefesal, Lefale, &c., from A. Sax. leaf, a leaf, and sal, sel, a hall, a room; comp. Dan. lövæl, Sw. löfsal, a hut of green branches.] 1. A lattice.—2. A pent-house or projecting roof over a door, window, &c.—3. An open shed.

He looketh up and down til he hath found
The clerke's hors, there as he stood ybound
Behind the mille under a levecell. Chaucer.

Levee (lev'é), n. [Fr. levée, a gathering or levying, a levy, the breaking up of a meeting, an embankment, from lever, to raise. L. levo. The French word does not appear ever to have had the meaning which levee commonly has in English, levee being the proper French word for this meaning.] 1. A morning reception held by a prince or great personage; a morning assembly. The term is chiefly applied in this country to the stated public occasions on which the sovereign receives visits from such persons as are entitled by rank or fortune to the honour. It is distinguished from a drawing-room in this respect, that while at the former gentlemen alone appear (with the exception of the chief ladies of the court), both ladies and gentlemen are admitted to the latter. In the United States, the term is applied to any general or miscellaneous assemblage of guests, usually in the evening; as, the president's levee.—2. The act or time of rising. Johnston.—3. [Borrowed from the use of the word by the French settlers.] In America, an embankment on the margin of a river, to confine it within its natural channel; as, the levees on the banks of the Mississippi.—Levee en masse. See LEVEE.

Levee (lev'é), v. t. 1. To attend the levee of; to hunt or pursue at levees. [Rare.]

Warm in pursuit, he levees all the great. Young.

2. To embark; as, to levee a river.

Level (lev'el), n. [A. Sax. læfel, from L. libella, a line or other appliance for testing whether a surface is level, from libra, a balance, a plummet, a level. The A. Sax. læfel no doubt merged in the O. Fr. level (now niveau), also from L. libella.] 1. An instrument by which to find or draw a straight line parallel to the plane of the horizon, and by this means to determine the true level or the difference of ascent or descent between several places, for various purposes in architecture, agriculture, engineering, hydraulics, surveying, &c. There is a great variety of instruments for this purpose, differently constructed and of different materials, according to the particular purposes to which they are applied, as the carpenter's level, mason's level, gunner's level, balance level, water level, mercurial level, spirit level, surveying level, &c. All such instruments, however, may be reduced to three classes:—(1) Those in which the vertical line is determined by a suspended plumb line or balance weight, and the horizontal indicated by a line perpendicular to it. Such are the carpenter's and mason's levels. (2) Those which determine a horizontal line by the surface of a fluid at rest, as water and mercurial levels. (3) Those which point out the direction of a horizontal line by a bubble of air floating in a fluid contained in a glass tube. Such are spirit-levels, which are by far the most convenient and accurate. All levels depend on the same principle, namely, the action of terrestrial gravity.—2. A line or surface every point of which is equally distant from the centre of the earth: called a true level.—3. A line or surface which coincides with or is parallel to the plane of the horizon: called an apparent level.—4. A surface without inequalities.—5. Rate; standard; usual elevation; customary height; as, the ordinary level of the world.—6. Equal elevation with something else; a state of equality.

Providence, for the most part, sets us upon a level. Addison.

7. The line of direction in which a missile weapon is aimed. 'The level of mine aim.' Shak.

I stood if the level
Of a full-charged confederacy, and give thanks
To you that choked it. Shak.

8. Rule; plan; scheme.

Be the fair level of thy actions laid. Prior.

9. Fixed or settled position; natural position; position to which anything is entitled. 'When merit shall find its level.' F. W. Robertson.—10. In mining, an excavation or cutting in a lode; a horizontal gallery in a mine; levels are generally ten, twenty, thirty fathoms below the adit, in which case they are called the ten fathoms, twenty fathoms, &c., level.

Level (lev'el), a. 1. Horizontal; coinciding with the plane of the horizon, or parallel to it; as, to be perfectly level is to be exactly horizontal.—2. Not having one part higher than another; not ascending or descending; even; flat; having no inequalities of magnitude; as, a level plain or field; level ground; a level floor or pavement.—3. Even with anything else; of the same height; on the same line or plane.

Now shaves with level wing the deep, then soars Up to the very concave towering high. Milton.

The setting sun now beams more mildly bright, The shadows lengthening with the level light. Bentley.

4. Equal in rank or degree; having no degree of superiority.

Be level in preferences, and you will soon be as level in your learning. Bentley.

Level (lev'el), v. t. pret. & pp. levelled; ppr. levelling. 1. To make horizontal; to reduce to a horizontal plane.—2. To make smooth or even; to reduce or remove inequalities of surface in anything; as, to level a road or walk.—3. To reduce or bring to the same height with something else; to lay flat; to reduce to an even surface or plane.

And their proud structures level with the ground. Sandys.

He levels mountains, and he raises plains. Dryden.

4. To reduce to equality of condition, state, or degree; as, to level all ranks and degrees of men.

The consequence has been (in too many physical systems), to level the study of nature, in point of moral interest, with the investigations of the algebraist. Stewart.

5. To point, in taking aim; to elevate or depress so as to direct a missile weapon to an object; to aim; as, to level a cannon or musket.

The setting sun . . . Against the eastern gate of Paradise Levelled his evening rays. Milton.

Hence—6. To aim; to direct; as, severe remarks levelled at the vices and follies of the age.—7. To adapt; to suit; to proportion; as, to level observations to the capacity of children.—To level up, to raise something that is low to the level of anything higher; specifically, to raise a lower person or class to the level of a higher.—To level down, to lower to the same level or status.

Level (lev'el), v. i. 1. To accord; to agree; to suit. [Rare.]

Such accommodation and besort As levels with her breeding. Shak.

2. To be in the same direction with something; to be aimed.

He near to his engine flew, Plac'd his ear to hand in open view, And rais'd it till it level'd right, Against the glow-worm tail of kite. Hudibras.

3. To point a gun or an arrow to the mark; as, he immediately levelled and fired.—4. To direct the view or purpose; to make attempts; to aim.

The glory of God and the good of his church . . . ought to be the mark whereto we also level. Hooker.

Ambitious York did level at thy crown. Shak. 5. † To conjecture; to attempt to guess. 'He levelled at our purposes.' Shak.

Level-coil (lev'el-kōil), n. An old Christmas game in which each hunted the other from his seat, the loser giving up his seat to the winner; hence, riotous sport of any kind.

Young Justice Bramble has kept level-coil Here in our quarters, stole away our daughter. B. Tensen.

Levelless, † a. Without leave. Chaucer. Levelism (lev'el-izm), n. The act or principles of levelling distinctions in society. [Rare.]

Leveller (lev'el-ēr), n. 1. One who levels or makes even.—2. One who destroys or attempts to destroy social distinctions and reduce all men to equality.

You are an everlasting leveller; you won't allow encouragement to extraordinary merit. Collier.

Its structure strongly proves the truth of the maxim that princes are true levellers—real republicans—among themselves. Brougham.

[The term Levellers was particularly given to a party which arose in the army of the Long Parliament about the year 1647. They professed a determination to level all ranks and establish an equality in titles and estates throughout the kingdom. They were put down by Fairfax.]

Levelling (lev'el-ing), n. 1. The reduction of uneven surfaces to a level or plane.—

2. The art or operation of ascertaining the different elevations of objects on the surface of the earth; the art or practice of finding how much any assigned point on the earth's surface included in a survey is higher or lower than another assigned point. It is a branch of surveying of great importance in making roads, determining the proper lines for railways, conducting water, draining low grounds, rendering rivers navigable, forming canals, and the like. In ordinary cases of levelling (for example, for canals, railways, &c.) the instruments commonly employed are a spirit-level with a telescope attached to it, and a stand for mounting them on, and a pair of levelling staves.

Levelling-pole, Levelling-rod (lev'el-ing-pōl, lev'el-ing-rod), n. Same as Levelling-staff.

Levelling-staff (lev'el-ing-staf), n. An instrument used in levelling in conjunction with a spirit-level and telescope. It is variously constructed, but consists essentially of a graduated pole with a cone sliding upon it so as to mark the height at any particular distance above the ground. In levelling two of them are used together, and being set up at any required distance the surveyor, by means of a telescope placed between them perfectly horizontally, is enabled to compare the relative heights of the two places. Called also Levelling-pole, Levelling-rod, Station-pole, or Station-staff.

Levelly (lev'el-li), adv. In a level manner; evenly.

Levelness (lev'el-nēs), n. The condition of being level; evenness; equality.

Leven (lev'n). See LEAVEN.

Levent (lev'en), n. Lightning. See LEVIN.

Leven (lev'en), n. A lawn; an open space between woods. [Scottish.]

Lever (lê'vēr), n. [Fr. levier, from lever, L. levo, to raise.] 1. In mech. a bar of metal, wood, or other substance turning on a support called the fulcrum or prop, and used to overcome a certain resistance (called the weight) encountered at one part of the bar by means of a force (called the power) applied at another part. It is one of the mechanical powers, and is of three kinds, viz.: (1) When the fulcrum is between the weight and the power, as in the handspike, crow-bar, &c. In this case the parts of the lever on each side of the fulcrum are called the arms, and these arms may either be equal as in the balance, or unequal as in the steelyard. (2) When the weight is between the power and the fulcrum, as in rowing a boat, where the fulcrum is the water. (3) When the power is between the weight and the fulcrum, as in raising a ladder from the ground by applying the hands to one of the lower rounds, the fulcrum in this case being the foot of the ladder. The bones of animals are levers of the third kind. Fig. 1 represents a lever of the first kind, the power of acting at A, the weight or resistance at W, C being the fulcrum or prop. Fig. 2 is a lever of the second kind, fig. 3 a lever of the third kind. In all levers the power and weight are inversely proportional to the perpendicular lines drawn from the fulcrum to the directions in which the two forces act.—2. A watch with a lever escapement; a lever watch.—3. In argy. one of the arms of an obstatrical forceps.—4. In dentistry, an instrument used in extracting the stumps of teeth.—Compound lever, a machine consisting of several simple levers combined together and acting on each other.

Lever escapement, in a watch, an escapement in which the pallets are affixed to a bar or lever vibrating on its centre and having at one end a notch or fork which catches a pin connected with the balance-wheel and drives this pin backwards and forwards so as to give the balance-wheel its reciprocal motion.—Lever watch, a watch with a lever escapement.—Universal lever, a contrivance by means of which the reciprocating motion of a lever is made to communicate a continuous rotatory motion to a wheel, and a continuous rectilinear motion to anything attached by a rope to the axle of the wheel.

Lever (lê'vēr), a. compar. of leve, lieve, or levee. [See LIEVE.] More agreeable.

Lever (lê'vēr), adv. Rather; more gladly; more willingly.

Shalt thou never eat nor drink, said the steward, Till my lord be come to town?

I make mine avow to God, said Little John, I had lever to crack thy crown. Old ballad.

Leverage (lê'vēr-āj), n. 1. The action of a lever; the arrangement by which lever power is gained. 'The fulcrum of the leverage.' 1. Taylor.—2. Lever power; the mechanical advantage or power gained by using a lever.

Lever-board (lê'vēr-bōrd), n. See LOUVRE.

Leveret (lev'ér-et), n. [Fr. levrette, dim. of O. Fr. leure (now lièvre), a hare, from L. lepus, leporis, a hare.] A hare in the first year of its age.

Leverhook (lê'vēr-ok), n. A lark. See LARK.

Lever-valve (lê'vēr-valv), n. A safety-valve kept down by the pressure of an adjustable weight. In locomotives a spring is substituted for the weight, and the pressure is regulated by a screw and indicated on a brass plate.

Levesall, † n. See LÉVECEIL.

Leveret (lê'vēr), † n. [Fr. lever, to raise, to call up.] The morning call on the trumpet by which soldiers are summoned to rise; a reveille.

Come, sir, a quaint lever To waken our brave general. Beau. & Fl.

Leveth, † v. t. Imper. second pers. pl. Leveth me, believe me. Chaucer.

Leviable (lev'i-a-bl), a. That may be levied; that may be assessed and collected; as, sums leviable by law.

Leviathan (lê'vī'a-than), n. [Heb. lwyāthān, a term which etymologically seems to mean a long jointed monster.] 1. An aquatic animal described in the book of Job, ch. xli, and mentioned in other passages of Scripture. In Isaiah it is called the crooked serpent. It is not known what animal is intended by the writers, whether the crocodile, the whale, or a species of serpent. 2. A fabulous sea-monster of immense size.

Levier (lev'i-ēr), n. One who levies.

Levigable (lev'i-ga-bl), a. That can be rubbed or ground down to fine powder.

Levigate (lev'i-gät), v. t. pret. and pp. levigated; ppr. levigating. [L. levigo, from levis, smooth.] 1. In phar. and chem. to rub or grind to a fine impalpable powder; to make fine, soft, and smooth.—2. To plane; to polish. 'When use hath levigated the organs.' Barrow.

Levigate (lev'i-gät), a. 1. Made smooth, as if by polishing.—2. Made less harsh or burdensome; alleviated. 'His labours being levigated, and made more tolerable.' Sir T. Elyot. [Rare.]

Levigation (lev-i-gä'shon), n. The act or operation of grinding or rubbing a solid substance to a fine impalpable powder.

Levin (lev'in), n. [O. E. levene, levene, &c., from or allied to A. Sax. lig, lige, flame, ligen, flaming, E. leme, leam, flame. The connection between levin and A. Sax. lig, ligen, is similar to that between icel. loy and Dan. lov, law, icel. skóg, Dan. skov, a wood, E. laugh, and its present pronunciation luf; the connection between it and leme again is paralleled by Icel. himinn and hinn, E. heaven, Sw. hann, Icel. höfn, E. haven.] Lightning. Spenser.

To him, as to the burning levin.
Short, bright, resistless course was given.
Sir W. Scott.

Levin-brand (lev'in-brand), n. A thunder-bolt. Spenser.

Levine (lé'vin), n. See LEVYNE.

Leviner (lev'in-ér), n. A swift species of hound.

Levirate, Leviratical (lé-vi-rát, lé-vi-rát'-ik-ál), a. [L. levir, a husband's brother.] In Jewish antiqu. (a) a term applied to the law according to which a woman whose husband died without issue was to be married to the husband's brother. Deut. xxv. 5. (b) Made in accordance with the levirate law.

The first-born son of a leviratical marriage was reckoned and registered as the son of the deceased brother. Dean Alford.

Leviration (lé-vi-rá'shon), n. The act or custom among the Jews of a man's marrying the widow of a brother who died without issue. The same custom or law prevails in some parts of India.

Levitation (lev-i-tá'shon), n. [From L. levitas, lightness, from levis, light.] 1. The act of making light; lightness; buoyancy.

The lungs also of birds, as compared with the lungs of quadrupeds, contain in them a provision distinguishingly calculated for this same purpose of levitation. Paley.

2. Among Spiritualists, the alleged phenomenon of bodies heavier than air being by spiritual means rendered buoyant in the atmosphere.

Levite (lé'vit), n. [From Levi, one of the sons of Jacob.] 1. In Jewish history, one of the tribe or family of Levi; a descendant of Levi; more particularly, one of those persons who were employed in various duties connected with the tabernacle, or afterwards with the temple, as in bringing wood and other necessities for the sacrifices, singing and playing in connection with the services, &c. They were subordinate to the priests, the descendants of Aaron, who was also of the family of Levi.—2. A priest: so used in contempt or ridicule.

A young Levite . . . might be had for his board, a small garret, and ten pence a year. Macaulay.

Levitic, Levitical (lé-vi'tik, lé-vi'tik-ál), a. 1. Belonging to or connected with the Levites.—2. Priestly. 'Certain theological, or rather levitical, questions.' Milton.—Levitical degrees, degrees of kindred within which persons are prohibited to marry. They are set forth in Lev. xviii. 6-18.

Leviticall (lé-vi'tik-ál), adv. After the manner of the Levites.

Leviticus (lé-vi'tik-us), n. [From Levi, Levite.] A canonical book of the Old Testament, the third book of Moses, containing principally the laws and regulations relating to the priests and Levites and to offerings; the body of the ceremonial law.

Levity (lé-vi'ti), n. [L. levitas, from levis, light.] 1. Lightness; the want of weight in a body compared with another that is heavier; as, the ascent of a balloon in the air is owing to its levity.—2. Lightness of temper or conduct; want of due consideration; want of seriousness; disposition to trifle; inconstancy; changeableness; unsteadiness; fickleness; capriciousness; volatility; as, the levity of youth.

The levity that is fatigued and disgusted with everything of which it is in possession. Burke.

Levoglucose, Levoglucoose (lé-vó-glú-kóe), n. In chem., a sugar isomeric with dextroglucose, but distinguished from it by turning the plane of polarization to the left, and always occurring along with it in honey, in many fruits, and in other sacchariferous vegetable organs. The mixture of these two sugars in equal numbers of molecules constitutes fruit-sugar or inverted sugar, which itself turns the plane of polarization to the left, the specific rotatory power of levoglucoose being greater than that of dextroglucose.

If the analyzer (a slice of quartz) has to be turned towards the right, so as to cause the colours to succeed each other in their natural order—red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, violet—the piece of quartz is called right-handed, or dextrogyrate. If, however, the analyzer has to be turned from right to left to obtain the natural order of colours, the quartz is called left-handed or levogyrate, the two kinds of polarization respectively called right-handed circular polarization and left-handed circular polarization. Haydn.

Levulose, Levulose (lé-vú-lóe), n. One of the constituents of fruit-sugar or inverted sugar.

Under the influence of dilute acids, or long boiling with water, cane-sugar is converted into what is called inverted sugar, a mixture of dextrose and levulose. It is called inverted, because the left-handed rotation of the levulose is greater than the right-handed rotation of the dextrose. Haydn.

Levy (lev'i), n. [Fr. levée, a raising or levying, a levy of troops or taxes, &c., from lever, L. levo, to raise.] 1. The act of levying or collecting, especially for public service; as, a levy of troops was then made.—2. That which is levied, as a body of troops, or the amount accruing from a tax.

And king Solomon raised a levy out of all Israel; and the levy was thirty thousand men. 1 Ki. v. 13.

And this is the reason of the levy which king Solomon raised; for to build the house of the Lord, and his own house, &c. 1 Ki. ix. 15.

3. In law, the act of collecting on execution.—Levy in mass [Fr. levée en masse], the act of levying for military service all the able-bodied men of a country.

Levy (lev'i), v.t. pret. & pp. levied; ppr. levying. [From the noun, and perhaps partly directly from the Fr. lever.] 1. To raise; to collect; as, to levy troops; to levy taxes.

Edward the First covenanted in express terms for himself and his heirs, that they would never again levy any aid without the assent and good-will of the estates of the realm. Macaulay.

2. In law, (a) to erect or construct; as, to levy a mill; to levy a ditch. (b) To take or seize on execution or by seizure or distress.—3. To raise or desist from, as a siege.

Euphranor having levied the siege from this one city, forthwith led his army to Demetrias. Holland.

—To levy war is to raise or begin war; to take arms for attack; to attack.—To levy a fine, to commence and carry on a suit for assuring the title to lands or tenements.

Levyne (lev'in), n. [So called from Levy the crystallographer.] A mineral found in Ireland, Faroe, and some other places. It occurs crystallized, the primary form being an acute rhomboid. It is a hydrated silicate of calcium and aluminum.

Lew (lá), a. [Allied to D. lauw, G. lau, lukewarm; comp. also A. Sax. hleowan, to be warm.] Tepid; lukewarm. [Old and provincial.]

Lewd (lúd), a. [O. E. lewed, lewd, lay, ignorant; A. Sax. lewed, lewd, &c., lay, laic, pp. of lewan, to weaken, enfeeble. Skeat.] 1. Lay; laic; not clerical; unlearned; ignorant; simple.

So these great clerks their little wisdom shew
To mock the lewd, as learn'd in this as they. Sir J. Davies.

2. Vile; despicable; profligate; wicked. But the Jews which believed not, . . . took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, . . . and assaulted the house of Jason. Acts xvii. 5.

Great numbers of men were trained up in an idle and dissolute way and then, if not ashamed to beg, too lewd to work, and ready for any kind of mischief. Southey.

3. Given to the unlawful indulgence of lust; addicted to fornication or adultery; dissolute; lustful; libidinous.—4. Proceeding from unlawful lust; as, lewd actions.—SYN. Lustful, libidinous, licentious, profligate, dissolute, sensual, unchaste, impure, lascivious, lecherous.

Lewdly (lúd'li), adv. In a lewd manner: (a) Ignorantly; foolishly. Spenser. (b) Grossly; coarsely; wantonly; wickedly.

Whom she with leasings lewdly did niscall
And wickedly backbite. Spenser.

Yet lewdly darest our ministering upbraid. Milton.
(c) With the unlawful indulgence of lust; lustfully.

Lewdness (lúd'nes), n. The state or quality of being lewd: (a) Ignorance; folly. (b) Wickedness. (c) The unlawful indulgence of lust; fornication or adultery; lasciviousness. SYN. Lasciviousness, impurity, unchastity, debauchery, lechery, licentiousness, sensuality, profligacy.

Lewdsby (lúd'sbi), n. A lewd or lecherous person.

Lewdster (lúd'stér), n. One given to criminal indulgence of lust; a lecher.

Against such lewdsters and their lechery
Those that betray them do no treachery. Shak.

Lewd, a. Ignorant; unlearned; lascivious. Chaucer.

Lewis, Lewisson (lé'is, lé'is-son), n. 1. The name of one kind of shears used in cropping woollen cloth.—2. An instrument of iron used in raising large stones to the upper part of a building. It operates by the dovetailing of one of its ends into an opening in the stone, so formed that no vertical force can detach it. In the figure a c are two movable parts, perforated at their heads to admit the pin or bolt e d. These are inserted by hand into the cavity formed in the stone, and between them the part b is introduced, which pushes their points out to the sides of the stone, thus filling the cavity; e is a half-ring bolt with a perforation at each end, to this the tackle above is attached by a hook. The fastening pin passes horizontally through all the holes, entering at the right side d, and forelocking on the other end e.

Lewis.

zontally through all the holes, entering at the right side d, and forelocking on the other end e.

Lex (leks), n. [L. from same root as E. to lie.] Law: a word used in various law phrases; as, lex loci contractus, the law of the place where the contract is made; lex talionis, the law of retaliation directing the punishment to be analogous to the crime, as an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, &c.; lex non scripta, the unwritten or common law; lex scripta, the written or statute law; lex mercatoria, mercantile law.

Lexical (leks'ik-ál), a. Pertaining to a lexicon.

Lexically (leks'ik-ál), adv. By means of a lexicon; according to lexicography or a lexicon.

By modifying a root lexically is here meant varying its signification. Sir J. Stoddart.

Lexicographer (leks-i-kog'ra-fér), n. [See LEXICOGRAPHY.] The author or compiler of a lexicon or dictionary.

Lexicographer, n. a writer of dictionaries, a harmless drudge, that busies himself in tracing the original and detailing the signification of words. Johnson.

Lexicographic, Lexicographical (leks'í-kog'ra-fík, leks'í-kog'ra-fík-ál), a. Pertaining to the writing or compilation of a dictionary.

Lexicography (leks-i-kog'ra-fí), n. [Gr. lexikon, and graphō, to write.] 1. The act of writing a lexicon or dictionary, or the occupation of composing dictionaries.—2. The principles on which dictionaries are, or should be, constructed; the art of compiling a dictionary.

Librarian (lib'ri-ri-an), n. [Its meaning 1 from libra, in 2 from L. librarius, a transcriber of books.] 1 The keeper or one who has the care of a library or collection of books. 2 One who transcribes or copies books.

Librarianship (lib'ri-ri-an-ship), n. The office of a librarian.

Library (lib'ra-ri), n. [L. librarium, a bookcase, libra, a bookseller's shop, from liber, a book. See LIBET.] 1 A collection of books belonging to a private person or to a public institution or a company. 'A list of his majesty's library.' Walpole.—2 An apartment or suite of apartments, or a whole building appropriated to the keeping of a collection of books.

Librate (lib'rat), v. t. pret. & pp. librated; ppr. librating [L. libra, librum, from libra, a balance, a level—whence libra, level.] To hold in equipoise; to poise, to balance.

Librate (lib'rat), v. i. To move, as a balance, to be poised.

Their parts all librate on two nice beams. Clifton.

Libration (lib'ra-shen), n. 1 The act of librating or balancing, or state of being librated or balanced, a state of equipoise, with equal weights on both sides. 'The libration and frequent weighing of his wings.' Jer Taylor.—2 In astronomy, a real or apparent libratory motion like that of a balance before coming to rest. Libration of the moon, an apparent irregularity of the moon's motion, whereby those parts very near the border of the lunar disc alternately become visible and invisible, indicating, as it were, a sort of vibratory motion of the lunar globe. The libration of the moon is of three kinds: (a) libration in longitude, or a seeming vibratory motion according to the order of the signs, owing to this circumstance, that the motion of the moon about her axis is not always precisely equal to the angular velocity in her orbit. (b) libration in latitude, in consequence of her axis being inclined to the plane of her orbit, so that sometimes one of her poles and sometimes the other declines as it waxes or dips towards the earth. (c) diurnal libration, which is simply a consequence of the lunar parallax. In this case as the observer at the surface of the earth perceives points near the upper edge of the moon's disc, at the time of her rising, which disappear as her elevation is increased, while new ones on the opposite or lower edge, that were before invisible, come into view as she descends towards the horizon. If the observer were placed at the earth's centre he would perceive no diurnal libration. Libration of the earth, a term applied by some of the older astronomers to that feature of the earth's motion by which while revolving in its orbit its axis constantly continues parallel to itself.

Libratory (lib'ra-to-ri), a. Balancing; moving like a balance, as it tends to an equilibrium or level, oscillating.

Libretto (lib'bre-to), n. [It., a little book.] 1 A book containing the words of an extended musical composition, as an opera, oratorio, and the like. 2 The words themselves.

Licht (lich), n. [A Sax lite, a dead body; G leiche, a corpse, Goth leik, Icel lit, D licht, the body. Hence lichtwater, lychwater, watching with the dead, licht-gate, a shed at the church-gate to rest the corpse under; licht-feld, the field of corpses.] A dead body; a corpse.

Lichens (li'ken or lich'en), n. [Gr lichēn.] 1 In bot. one of an order of cellular cryptogamic plants without stem and leaves, and consisting mainly of a thallus. Lichens, like algae, are nourished through their whole surface by the medium in which they live, which in the case of the former is air. Reproduction generally takes place by spores, but in circumstances unfavourable to the production or development of these and spores they are propagated by gemmules. They appear in the form of thin flat crusts, covering rocks and the bark of trees, or growing upon the ground, or in foliaceous expansions, or branched like a shrub in miniature, or sometimes only as a gelatinous mass or a powdery substance. They are called rock-moss and tree-moss, and some of the liverworts are of this order. They also include the ice land-moss and reindeer moss; but they are entirely distinct from the true mosses (Musci). Lichens abound in the cold and temperate parts of the world. The greater part are of no known use except in preparing the surface of the earth for the re-ception of larger vegetables, but some are used as tonic medicines, as Parietaria faginea, and Iceland-moss (Cetraria islandica), when deprived of its bitterness by boiling becomes a diet recommended to invalids. Their principal use is to furnish the dyer with brilliant colours—archil, cudbear, and several others are thus employed.—2 In med. an eruption of papules, of a red or white colour, either clustered together or disseminated over the surface of the skin, with or without fever, or derangement of the digestive organs, usually terminating in slight desquamation, and very liable to [L. libero, liberatum, from liber, free.] To release from restraint or bondage; to set at liberty; to free; to deliver; to disengage; as, to liberate a slave; to liberate one from duress or imprisonment; to liberate the mind from the shackles of prejudice.

By what means a man may liberate himself from those fears. Johnson.

Liberation (lîb'ër-rä'shon), n. [L. liberatio, liberationis, from libero, to free. See LIBERATE.] The act of delivering, or the state of being delivered from restraint, confinement, slavery, debt, and the like.

Liberator (lîb'ër-rä-ër), n. One who liberates or delivers.

He (Luther) was the great reformer and liberator of the European intellect. Buckle.

Liberatory (lîb'ër-ra-tö-ri), a. Tending to liberate or set free.

Libero-motor (lîb'ër-o-mö-tor), a. Letting out or liberating nerve-force.

Each ganglion is a libero-motor agent. Herbert Spencer.

Libertarian (lîb'ër-tä-ri-an), a. Pertaining to liberty, or to the doctrine of free will, as opposed to the doctrine of necessity.

Libertarian (lîb'ër-tä-ri-an), n. One who holds the doctrine of moral freedom, or the doctrine of the freedom of the will.

It retorts against himself the very objection of incomprehensibility by which the fatalist had thought to triumph over the libertarian. Sir W. Hamilton.

I believe he (Dr. Crombie) may claim the merit of adding the word 'libertarian' to the English language as Priestley added that of 'necessarian.' Reid.

Libertarianism (lîb'ër-tä-ri-an-izm), n. The principles or doctrines of libertarians.

Liberticide (lîb'ër-ti-äid), n. [Liberty, and L. cædo, to kill.] 1. Destruction of liberty. 2. A destroyer of liberty.

Libertinage (lîb'ër-tin-äj), n. Undue freedom of opinions or conduct; license.

A growing libertinage, which disposed them to think slightly of the Christian faith. Warburton.

Libertine (lîb'ër-tin), n. [L. libertinus, from liber, free.] 1. Among the Romans, a freedman; a person manumitted or set free from legal servitude.—2. One unconfined; one free from restraint.

When he speaks,
The air, a charter'd libertine, is still. Shak.

3. One who indulges his lust without restraint; one who leads a dissolute, licentious life; a rake; a debauchee.—4. † One who holds loose views with regard to the laws of religion or morality; an irreligious person.

5. One of a sect of heretics in Holland, who maintained that nothing is sinful but to those who think it sinful, and that perfect innocence is to live without doubt. They rejected all the customs and decencies of life, and advocated a community of goods and of women.

That the Scriptures do not contain in them all things necessary to salvation is the fountain of many great and capital errors: 1 instance in the whole doctrine of the libertines, familists, quakers, and other enthusiasts, which issue in the corrupted fountain. Sir Taylor.

6. † A freeman of an incorporate town or city.

And used me like a fugitive, an inmate in a town,
That no city libertine, nor capable of their gown. Chapman.

Libertine (lîb'ër-tin), a. [Fr. libertin, licentious; L. libertinus, from libertus, one made free, from liber, free.] Licentious; dissolute; not under the restraint of law or religion; as, libertine principles. 'A libertine life.' Bacon.

Libertinism (lîb'ër-tin-izm), n. 1. State or condition of being a libertine or freedman. [Rare.]

Dignified with the title of freeman, and denied the libertinism that belongs to it. Hammond.

2. The state or conduct of a libertine or rake; licentiousness; unrestrained indulgence of lust; debauchery; lewdness.—3. † Irreligiousness; carelessness for the dictates of morality.

That spirit of religion and seriousness vanished all at once, and a spirit of liberty and libertinism, of infidelity and profaneness, started up in the room of it. Atterbury.

Liberty (lîb'ër-ti), n. [L. libertas, from liber, free; Fr. liberté.] 1. The state or condition of one who is free; exemption from restraint; power of acting as one pleases; freedom.

'Tis liberty alone that gives the flower
Of fleeting life its lustre and perfume. Couper.

2. Permission granted, as by a superior, to do something that one might not otherwise do; leave; as, liberty given to a child to play, or to a witness to leave a court.—3. Immunity enjoyed by prescription or by grant; privilege; exemption; franchise; as, the liberties of the commercial cities of Europe.—4. A place or district within which certain exclusive privileges may be exercised; a place of exclusive jurisdiction; as, within the city liberty.—5. A certain amount of freedom; permission to go about freely within certain limits, as in a place of confinement; also, the place or limits within which such freedom or privilege is exercised; as, the liberties of a prison.—6. Action or speech of one person to another hardly warranted by their relative positions; freedom not specially granted; freedom of action or speech beyond the ordinary bounds of civility or decorum; as, may I take the liberty of calling on you?

He was repeatedly provoked into striking those who had taken liberties with him. Macaulay.

7. The power of an agent to do or forbear any particular action, according to the determination or thought of the mind, by which either is preferred to the other; freedom of the will; exemption from compulsion or restraint in willing or volition.—8. Freedom from occupation or engagements; disengagement.—9. In the manège, a curve or arch in that part of the bit placed in the mouth of a horse in order to afford room for the tongue of the animal.—Natural liberty, the power of acting as one thinks fit, without any restraint or control, except from the laws of nature. It is a state of exemption from the control of others, and from positive laws and the institutions of social life. This liberty is abridged by the establishment of government.—Civil liberty, the liberty of men in a state of society, or natural liberty, so far only abridged and restrained as is necessary and expedient for the safety and interest of the society, state, or nation. Civil liberty is an exemption from the arbitrary will of others, secured by established laws, which restrain every man from injuring or controlling another. Hence the restraints of law are essential to civil liberty.—Political liberty, a term sometimes used as synonymous with civil liberty. But it more properly designates the liberty of a nation, the freedom of a nation or state from all unjust abridgment of its rights and independence by another nation. Hence we often speak of the political liberties of Europe, or the nations of Europe.—Religious liberty, the free right of adopting and enjoying opinions on religious subjects, and of worshipping the Supreme Being according to the dictates of conscience, without external control.—Liberty of the press, freedom from any restriction on the power to publish books; the free power of publishing what one pleases, subject only to punishment for abusing the privilege, or publishing what is mischievous to the public or injurious to individuals.—Cap of liberty, a cap or hat used as a symbol of liberty. In ancient times the manumitted slaves put on what was termed the Phrygian cap, in token of their freedom. In modern times, a red cap worn by French revolutionaries.—Leave, Liberty, License. See under LEAVE.

'A list of his majesty's library.' Walpole.—2 An apartment or suite of apartments, or a whole building appropriated to the keeping of a collection of books.

Librate (līb'rat), v. t. pret. & pp. librated, pp. librating. [L. libro, librarium, from libra, a balance, a level—whence E. level.] To hold in equilibrium, to poise, to balance.

Librate (līb'rat), v. i. To move, as a balance, to be poised.

These parts all librate on two nice beams. Cydon.

Libration (līb'rā-shən), n. 1 The act of vibrating or balancing, or state of being vibrated or balanced, a state of equipoise, with equal weights on both sides. 'The libration and frequent weighing of his wings.' Jer. Taylor. 2 In astronomy, a real or apparent libratory motion like that of a balance before coming to rest. Libration of the moon, an apparent irregularity of the moon's motion, whereby those parts very near the border of the lunar disc alternately become visible and invisible, indicating, as it were, a sort of vibratory motion of the lunar globe. The libration of the moon is of three kinds: (a) libration in longitude, or a seeming vibratory motion according to the order of the signs, owing to this circumstance, that the motion of the moon about her axis is not always precisely equal to the angular velocity in her orbit. (b) libration in latitude, in consequence of her axis being inclined to the plane of her orbit, so that sometimes one of her poles and sometimes the other declines as it were, or dips towards the earth. (c) durnal libration, which is simply a consequence of the lunar parallax. In this case an observer at the surface of the earth perceives points near the upper edge of the moon's disc, at the time of her rising, which disappear as her elevation is increased; while new ones on the opposite or lower edge, that were before invisible, come into view as she descends towards the horizon. If the observer were placed at the earth's centre he would perceive no diurnal libration. Libration of the earth, a term applied by some of the older astronomers to that feature of the earth's motion by which while revolving in its orbit its axis constantly continues parallel to itself.

Libratory (līb'rā-tō-ri), a. Balancing, moving like a balance, as it tends to an equilibrium or level oscillating.

Hence lich, lich, lich, watching with the dead, lich-gate, a shed at the church gate to rest the corpse under, lich-field, the field of corpses.] A dead body, a corpse.

Lichen (līb'sens or līb'sens), n. [Gr. lichēn.] 1 Is bot. one of an order of cellular cryptogamic plants without stem and leaves, and consisting mainly of a thallus. Lichens, like algae, are nourished through their whole surface by the medium in which they live, which in the case of the former is air. Reproduction generally takes place by spores, but in circumstances unfavorable to the production or development of these and spores they are propagated by gemmules. They appear in the form of thin flat crusts, covering rocks and the bark of trees, or growing upon the ground, or in foliaceous expansions, or branched like a shrub in miniature, or sometimes only as gelatinous masses or a powdery substance. They are called rock-moss and tree-moss, and some of the liverworts are of this order. They also include the Iceland-moss and reindeer moss, but they are entirely distinct from the true mosses (Musci). Lichens abound in the cold and temperate parts of the world. The greater part are of no known use except in preparing the surface of the earth for the reception of larger vegetables, but some are used as tonic medicines, as Veridarius faginus, and Iceland-moss (Cetraria islandica), when deprived of its bitterness by boiling becomes a diet recommended to invalids. Their principal use is to furnish the dye with brilliant colours archil, cudbear, and several others are thus employed.—2 In med. an eruption of papules of a red or white colour, either clustered together or disseminated over the surface of the skin, with or without fever, or derangement of the digestive organs, usually terminating in slight desquamation, and very liable to recur.

Lick (lik), v.t. [A. Sax. liccian, D. likken, Dan. likke, G. lecken, Goth. laigon, in bilai-gon, represented in the kindred tongues by Ir. lighim, L. lingo, Gr. leicho, Skr. lîh, Slav. lisati, lokati, Lith. laizyti, to lick; allied also to L. lygurio, to lick, to feast by stealth. Hence, according to Diez, It. leccare (from O. H. G. leccon), Fr. liquar, licher, Fr. lécher. Comp. lecher, lickerish, which are also from this stem. Some forms beginning with s seem closely allied, as D. slikken, to swallow; Dan. slikke, Icel. slækja, Prov. E. and Sc. slake, slak, to lick, to smear. With regard to lick, Gr. leicho, and similar forms, Pott remarks—'It would be useless for any one to say that in the conjunction of l, the most mobile of the linguals, with a following guttural (l-k, l-g) there is not present—I do not say a conscious, but certainly a kind of instinctive intentionality. By the l is sensuously represented the contact of the lips with an article of food or drink, while the guttural calls up the act of swallowing that follows.' 1. To pass or draw the tongue over the surface; as, a dog licks a wound.—2. To lap; to take in by the tongue; as, a dog or cat licks milk.—3. [See under noun, 5.] To strike repeatedly for punishment; to flog; to chastise with blows; to beat; to conquer. [Colloq.]

—To give the lie to, to charge with falsehood; to prove to be false; as, he gave him the lie direct; a man's actions may give the lie to his words.

Men will give their own experience the lie. Locke.

Syn. Falsehood, untruth, fiction, deception.

Lie (li), v.i. pret. & pp. lied; ppr. lying. [A. Sax. ledagan, D. liegen, Goth. liagan, Icel. luga, O. H. G. liagan, G. lügen, to lie; comp. Gael. leag, idle talk.] To utter falsehood with an intention to deceive; to say or do that which deceives another when he has a right to know the truth, or when morality requires a just representation.

Inform us, will the emper' treat?

Or do the prints and papers lie? Swift.

Lie (li), v.i. pret. lay; pp. lain (lién); ppr. lying. [A. Sax. ligan, to lie, of which leagan, to lay, is a causative; O. and Northern E. and Sc. ligge, lig; Goth. ligan, D. liggen, Dan. ligge, Icel. luggja, G. liegen, to lie. See LAW.] 1. To occupy a horizontal or nearly horizontal position; to rest lengthwise, or to be flat upon the surface of anything; to be placed and remain without motion; as, he is lying in bed; the book lies on the table; to this meaning the sense of being dead often attaches.

Her lily hand her rosy cheek lies under. Shak.

Limb of Gun-carriage.

consisting of two wheels and an axle, with a framework and shafts for the horses. On the top of the frame are two ammunition-boxes, which serve also as seats for two artificers. The limb is connected with the gun carriage properly so called, by an iron hook, called the pivot, hinged into an eye in the trail or wooden block which supports the cannon. When the gun is brought into action it is unlimbered by the block being unscrewed from the pivot, and laid on the ground, or carried round to right or left so as to make the pivot point in the desired direction. — 3 At the shafts of a carriage — 4 A hole cut through the four limbs as a passage for water to the pump-well.

Limper (limp'ēr), n. One who limps.

Limpet (limp'et), n. [O. Fr. limpîne, a limpet; comp. Gr. lepas, lepasos, a limpet.] A cyclobranchiate gasteropodous mollusc of the genus Patella, adhering to rocks. This adhesion is effected partly by the suctional powers of its broad disc-like foot, and partly by a strong glutinous secretion given off by the mucous follicles and canals of the foot. Most commonly the limpet is found ensconced in a shallow pit excavated out of the rock, and which it has made or rasped out by the siliceous particles embedded in its foot. From this pit the limpet, when covered by the tide, makes short journeys in quest of its food, which consists of algae, and which it eats by means of a long ribbon-like tongue covered with numerous rows of hard teeth. The common species (Patella vulgata) is used as bait, and is eaten by the poorer classes of Scotland and Ireland. In tropical seas they attain an immense size, one species having a shell about a foot wide.

to a system of gearing for working the valves of a locomotive-engine. In the accompanying cut A is the rod by which the slide-valve is worked, and by which, accordingly, the admission of steam to the cylinder is regulated; B, the reversing rod, which is fixed to a cross-bar, one end of which is jointed by means of another rod to a runner, which slides up and down in the slit of the curved piece, and which is also jointed to the rod
A. The curved piece is the link, and is jointed near the extremities to the rods of two eccentrics, an inner and an outer.
When the driver of the engine pushes forward the rod B the runner is raised to the top of the link, and therefore follows the motions of the upper end of the link, and places the slide-valve rod under the control of the inner eccentric. When he pushes it back he similarly places the rod under the control of the outer eccentric, which reverses the engine.

Eobanus was the Poet of the Reformation, and, with Melancthon and Camerarius, its chief literatur. Sir W. Hamilton.

[Literator, modified from litterateur, is much nearer being anglicized. This word, but not in the sense attached to it by Burke, we have long desiderated; and the countenance it has received from Southey, Landor, Lockhart, Mr. De Quincey, and Mr. Carlyle has already availed to take off something of its strangeness of aspect. Fitz-Edward Hall.]

Literature (lit'ér-á-tür), n. [L. litteratura, from littera, a letter.] 1. Learning; acquaintance with letters or books; skill in letters; as, a man of literature. — 2. The collective body of literary productions, embracing the entire results of knowledge and fancy preserved in writing; also, the whole collection of literary productions upon a given subject, or relative to a particular science or branch of knowledge; the collective writings of a country or period; as, the literature of geology; the literature of chess; Elizabethan literature; English literature.

3. The class of writings in which beauty of style or expression is a characteristic feature, as poetry, romance, history, biography, essays; in contradistinction to scientific works, or those written expressly to impart knowledge; belles-lettres. — 4. The literary profession; the calling of authors of books or other written matter, &c.

Literature is a very bad crutch, but a very good walking-stick. Lamb.

—Literature, Learning, Erudition. Literature, the more polished or artistic class of written compositions, or the critical knowledge and appreciation of such; learning, knowledge, that is, a store of facts acquired by study, especially in the literature of the past; erudition, scholastic or the more recondite sort of knowledge obtained by profound research.

Literature is the thought of thinking souls. Carlyle.
As learning advanced, new words were adopted into our language. Johnson.

Two of the French clergy with whom I passed my evenings were men of deep erudition. Burke.

Literatus (lit'ér-á-tus), n. pl. Literati (lit'ér-á-ti). [L.] A man of letters or erudition.

Now we are to consider that our bright ideal of a literatus may chance to be malmed. De Quincey.

Lith (lith), n. [A. Sax. lith, D. lid, Dan. lid, Icel. lithr, G. glied, Goth. lithus, member, limb, joint; allied to A. Sax. lithan, Goth. leithan, to go.] A member; a limb; a joint; a symmetrical part or division; as, sound in lith and limb.

The reader will at once comprehend the reason by cutting an orange through its centre obliquely to its axis. Each lith is of equal size, but the exposed surface of each on the freshly-cut circle will not be so. Prof. Nichol.

Lithagogue (lith-a-gog), a. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and ago, to bring away.] In med. having the power of expelling stone from the bladder or kidneys.

Lithagogue (lith-a-gog), n. A medicine formerly supposed to expel small calculi from the kidneys or bladder.

Lithanthrax (li-than'thraks), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and anthrax, a coal.] Stone-coal, a black, compact, brittle, inflammable substance, of laminated texture, more or less shining; in distinction from xyanthrax, or wood-coal.

Litharge (lith'árj), n. [Fr.; Gr. lithargyros — lithos, a stone, and argyros, silver, from argos, shining, bright.] The yellow or reddish protoxide of lead partially fused (PbO). On cooling it passes into a mass, consisting of small six-sided plates of a reddish-yellow colour, and semitransparent. It is much used in assaying as a flux, and enters largely into the composition of the glaze of common earthenware. — Litharge plaster, in med. lead plaster, prepared by boiling oxide of lead in very fine powder with olive-oil and water, until the oil and litharge unite.

Lithate (lith'át), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone.] A salt of lithic acid. See URATE.

Lithe (lith), a. [A. Sax. lithe, lithe, mild, gentle; O. Sax. litha, O. H. G. lindi, G. linde, geling, Dan. lind, Icel. linr, soft, mild; allied to L. lenis, soft, mild, calm. In A. Sax. and E. the n has been dropped, and the vowel lengthened, as in goose, sooth, tooth, &c.] 1. Soft; tender; mild; calm; agreeable. 'As lithe a day without appearance of any tempest.' Holmes. — 2. That may be easily bent; pliant; flexible; limber.

The unwieldy elephant,
To make them mirth, used all his might, and wreathed
His lithe proboscis. Milton.

Lithet (lith), v. t. [From the adjective.] To smooth; to soften; to palliate.

Lithet (lith), v. i. [Icel. litha, to listen, from lytha, a hearing or listening, and also silence, Goth. lihiw, quietness. Allied to loud, lay (a song), &c.] To give ear; to attend; to listen.

Lithe and listen, gentlemen,
All that now be here. Old ballad.

Litheness (lith'nes), n. The condition or quality of being lithe; flexibility; limberness.

Lither (lith'ér), a. Soft; pliant; yielding.

Two Talbots, winged through the lither sky. Shak.

Lither (lith'ér), a. [A. Sax. lyther, bad, wicked; allied to D. loder, a sensualist, G. liederlich, loose in morals.] Bad; corrupt; wicked.

Litherlie, Litherly (lith'ér-lí), a. 1. Mischievous; wicked. [Old English and Scotch.] He (the robin) was waspish, arch, and litherlie. But well Lord Cranston served he. Sir W. Scott.

2. Idle; lazy.

Lithia (lith'í-a), n. [From Gr. lithos, a stone, in allusion to the existence of the earth in a stony mineral.] (LiO.) 1. The only known oxide of the metal lithium, which was at first found in a mineral called petalite. It is of a white colour, very soluble in water, acrid, caustic, and acts on colours like other alkalies. — 2. In med. the formation of stone, gravel, or concretions in the human body. Also an affection in which the eyelids are edged with small, hard, stone-like concretions.

Lithiasis (li-thí-a-sis), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone.] In med. the formation of a calculus or stone in any part of the body, especially the urinary passages.

Lithate (lith'át), n. Same as Lithate.

Lithic (lith'ík), a. 1. Pertaining to or consisting of stone.

When we first meet the Buddhist style (of architecture) it is in its infancy—a wooden style painfully struggling into lithic forms. James Ferguson.

2. Pertaining to stone in the bladder; uric. — Lithic acid, an acid obtained from urinary or gouty calculus. See under URIC.

Lithium (lith'í-um), n. Sym. Li. At. wt. 7. The metallic base of lithia, which base was obtained by Sir H. Davy in the electrolysis of fused lithium chloride; it is of a silver-white lustre, but quickly tarnishes in the air. Lithium may be cut with a knife, but it is scarcely so soft as potassium or sodium; it fuses at 180° C., and takes fire at a somewhat higher temperature. Lithium floats upon rock-oil; it is the lightest of all known solid bodies; sp. gr. 0.5336. It forms salts analogous to those of potassium and sodium.

Lithobiblion (lith-o-bib'lí-on), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and biblion, a book.] Bibliolite (which see).

Lithocarp (lith-o-kárp), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and karpós, fruit.] Fossil fruit; carpollite (which see).

Lithochromatics, Lithochromics (lith-o-kró-mat'iks, lith-o-kró'miks), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and chróna, colour.] The art of painting in oil upon stone, and of taking impressions on canvas.

Lithocyst (lith'ó-sist), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and kystis, a cyst.] In zool. one of the sense-organs or marginal bodies of the Lucernaria or steganophthalmae Medusae.

No certain evidence of the existence of a nervous system in the Hydrozoa has yet been observed, but there can be little doubt that the lithocysts, or sacs containing mineral particles, which are so frequently found in the Medusoids and Medusae, are of the nature of auditory organs; while the masses of pigment, with embedded refracting bodies, which occur often associated with the lithocysts, are doubtless rudimentary eyes. Huxley.

Lithodendron (lith-o-den'dron), n. [Gr. lithos, stone, and dendron, tree.] A genus of carboniferous corals, so called from their resemblance to a petrified branch.

Lithodome (lith'ó-dóm), n. One of several species of molluscous animals, which make holes in rocks, shells, &c., in which they lodge; one of the genus Lithodomus.

Lithodomus (li-thod'o-mus), a. Relating to a genus of molluscs which perforate stones, &c.

Lithodomus (li-thod'o-mus), n. pl. Lithodomi (li-thod'o-mi). [Gr. lithos, stone, and domos, house.] A genus of Lamellibranchiata, belonging to the mussel family, which perforate stones, shells, &c. The mode in which the perforations are made is a subject of dispute.

Lithogenesi (lith-o-jen'e-sí), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and genesis, generation.] The doctrine or science of the origin of minerals composing the globe, and of the causes which have produced their form and disposition.

Lithogenous (li-tho'jen-us), a. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and gennáo, to produce.] Stone-producing; pertaining to the class of animals which form coral.

Litling, a. Very little. Chaucer.

Litmus (lit'mus), n. [G. lackmus, D. lakmos—lack, lacker, and mus, moes, a semi-liquid preparation, pap.] A peculiar colouring matter procured from Rocella tinctoria and some other lichens. Paper tinged blue by litmus is reddened by the feeblest acids, and hence is used as a test for the presence of acids; and litmus paper which has been reddened by an acid has its blue colour restored by an alkali.

Litorn (lit'orn), n. [Fr. litorne. Origin unknown.] A European bird, a species of thrush.

Litotes (li'tō-tēz), n. [Gr. litotēs, plainness, simplicity.] In rhet. a figure, according to the Greek and Latin rhetoricians, in which an affirmative is expressed by the negative of the contrary. It expresses less than what is intended to be conveyed to the mind of the reader or hearer. Thus, 'a citizen of no mean city,' means, 'of an illustrious city.' It is a figure constantly employed to soften what might otherwise appear obnoxious in self-commendation.

Litrameter (li-tram-et-ēr), n. [Gr. litra, a weight, and metron, a measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of liquids.

Litre (lē'tr), n. [Fr., from L.L. litra, from Gr. litra, a pound.] The French standard measure of capacity in the decimal system. The litre is a cubic decimetre; that is, a cube, each of the sides of which is 3.937 English inches; it contains 61.028 English cubic inches; the English imperial gallon is equal to fully 4½ litres, or more exactly 4.54546797 litres.

Litter (lit'tēr), n. [Fr. littère, Fr. littiera, from L.L. lectaria, and that from L. lectus, a bed or couch, from lego, lectum, to gather, to lay.] 1. A vehicle formed with shafts supporting a bed between them, in which a person may be borne by men or by a horse. If by the latter it is called a horse-litter.—2. Straw, hay, or other soft substance, used as a bed for horses and other animals; also, a covering of straw for plants.—3. Waste matters, shreds, fragments, and the like, scattered on a floor or other place; scattered rubbish; things scattered about or over in careless or slovenly manner.

Strephon, who found the room was void,
Stole in, and took a strict survey
Of all the litter as it lay. Swift.

4. A condition of disorder or confusion; as, the room is in a litter.

Litter (lit'tēr), v.t. 1. To scatter straw, hay, or other similar substance on or over for bedding.

He found a stall where oxen stood,
But for his ease well littered was the floor. Dryden.

2. To spread a bed for; to supply with litter; as, to litter a horse.—3. To make litter of; to use for litter. 'Old leaves and littered straw.' Dodley.—4. To scatter things over or about in a careless or slovenly manner.

Litter (lit'tēr), n. [Comp. leol. litr, the place where animals lay their young, from lag, a layer, a laying.] 1. The young produced at a birth by a quadruped, especially by a quadruped which brings forth a number at a birth, as the sow, the rabbit, the cat, the bitch, &c.—2. A birth or bringing forth, as of pigs, kittens, rabbits, puppies, &c. 'The thirty pigs at one large litter farrowed.' Dryden.

Litter (lit'tēr), v.t. To bring forth; to give birth to: said of quadrupeds, especially of such as produce a number at a birth, as the sow, cat, rabbit, bitch, &c., or of human beings in contempt.

My father named me Autolycus; who being, as I am, littered under Mercury, was likewise a snapper-up of unconsidered trifles. Shak.

Litter (lit'tēr), v.i. To bring forth a litter or young.

A horrible desert, . . . where the she-wolf still littered. Macaulay.

Litterateur (li-tēr-a-tēr), n. [Fr. littérateur.] A literary man; one engaged in literary work; one who adopts literature as a profession.

Refracted by one and another kind-hearted litterateur after another. C. Kingsley.

Littery (lit'tēr-ī), a. Consisting of litter; encumbered or covered with litter.

Little (lit'l), a. [The regular comparative and superlative of the word are wanting, and are supplied from a different root. The comparative used is less, or more rarely lesser. For the superlative least is used, the regular form littlest occurring very rarely except as a provincialism, and occasionally in colloquial language. It is used, however, by Shakspere. See LITTIEST.] [A. Sax. lytel, O.E. litell, lyttyle, &c., also lyte, lite, lile, lille, D. luttel, Iscl. lüttl, Sw. liten, Dan. liden, lille, Goth. leitila, lille; O.H.G. luzzi; farther alliances doubtful.] 1. Little (lit'l), adv. In a small quantity or degree; not much; slightly; as, he is little changed. 'The poor sleep little.' Otway.

Little-ease (lit'l-ēz), n. An old name for any kind of peculiarly uneasy punishment, as the stocks, pillory, or some especially uncomfortable part of a prison.

Was not this fellow's preaching a cause of all the trouble in Israel? was he not worthy to be cast in bocardio or little-ease? Ep. Latimer.

Little-go (lit'l-gō), n. In the English universities, a cant term for a public examination about the middle of the course, which, being less strict and less important in its consequences than the final one, has received this appellation.

Little-gude (lit'l-güd), n. The devil. [Scotch.]

The Little-gude was surely busy that night, for I thought the apparition was the widow. Gail.

Littleness (lit'l-nes), n. The state or quality of being little; smallness of size or bulk; meanness; want of grandeur or dignity; as, the littleness of the body or of an animal; littleness of conception.

The English and French, in verse, are forced to raise their language with metaphors, by the pomposity of the whole phrase to wear off any littleness that appears in the particular parts. Addison.

The angelic grandeur, by being concealed, does not awaken our poverty, nor mortify our littleness so much as if it was always displayed. Jer. Collier.

Littlest (lit'l-est), a. The regular but seldom used superlative of little.

Where love is great, the littlest doubts are feared. Shak.

Littleworth (lit'l-wérth), a. Worthless: a term often applied to a person who has a bad character, and is viewed as destitute of moral principle.

He returned for answer that he would not come to a stranger. He defended himself by saying, 'He had once come to a stranger who sent for him; and he found him a littleworth person.' Barwell.

Littleworth (lit'l-wérth), n. A person of little personal character, or of actually bad character; a blackguard.

Jacob lived in the land of Egypt. Gen. xlvii. 27.

5. To enjoy life; to be in a state of happiness.

Live while you live, the epicure would say,
And seize the pleasures of the present day;
Live while you live, the sacred preacher cries,
And give to God each moment as it flies:
Lord, in my views let both united be;
I live to pleasure when I live to thee. Doddridge.

6. To feed; to subsist; to be nourished and supported: generally with on or upon, sometimes by or with; as, horses live on grass or grain; fowls live on seeds or insects.

Animals that live upon other animals have their flesh more alkaliescent than those that live upon vegetables. Agassiz.

As I do live by food. Shak.

I had rather live
With cheese and garlic in a windmill, far,
Than feed on cates and have him talk to me
In any summer-house in Christendom. Shak.

7. To be maintained in life; to acquire a livelihood.

Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel. 1 Cor. ix. 14.

8. In Scrip. (a) to be exempt from spiritual death.

Ye shall therefore keep my statutes, and my judgments; which if a man do, he shall live in them. Lev. xviii. 5.

Liver (liv'ér), n. [A. Sax. līfer, D. and Dan. lever, Icel. lifr, G. leber; probably allied to G. lab, rennet, E. lopper, Sc. lapper, to coagulate, from its resemblance to a mass of clotted blood.] The glandular structure which in animals secretes the bile. In man it forms the largest gland of the body, weighing from 50 to 60 oz. The liver is not confined to vertebrates, all of which, with the exception of the Amphioxus or lancelet, possess a well-developed liver, but is found in many invertebrates. In the vertebrates the liver is a bilateral organ, and in early life it exhibits a perfect two-sided symmetry, extending to either side of the body; but as development advances the left lobe decreases in size, leaving the right lobe to form the larger half of the organ. The under surface of the liver shows a further subdivision of its parts into five lobes, separated by four fissures or clefts. The longitudinal fissure forms a deep groove dividing the liver into right and left lobes. The fissure for the gall-bladder forms a second cleft on the under surface of the organ. The third is the fissure of the inferior vena cava, lying in the same line as the fissure of the gall-bladder. The fourth is known as the transverse or portal fissure, which in a manner unites the other fissures, and runs at right angles into the longitudinal fissure. The transverse fissure transmits three vessels—the hepatic artery, the portal vein, and the hepatic duct—all of importance in the structure and functions of the liver. The two former vessels enter the organ and supply it with blood; the latter duct leaves the liver by the fissure, and carries the biliary secretion from the gland. In man the liver occupies a position in the right upper side and towards the front of the abdominal cavity. The liver is of a reddish-brown colour.—Liver of antimony, an oxy-sulphuret of antimony.—Liver of sulphur, fused sulphuret of potassium: so called from its liver-colour.

was originally a thing remitted or given, and particularly clothes for dependants or provender for horses. Fr. livrer is L. libero, to liberate.] 1. In law, (a) the act of giving possession of property: chiefly used in the phrase livery of seisin, that is, the putting a person in corporal possession of a freehold by giving him the ring, latch, or key of the door; or, if land, by delivering him a turf or twig; or, in either case, doing any act before witnesses which clearly places the party in possession. It formerly accompanied all conveyances of land, but is now confined to that conveyance called a feoffment. (b) The writ by which possession is given.—2. Release from wardship; deliverance.

Death fewer liveries gives

Than life.
It concerned them first to sue out their livery from the unjust wardship of his encroaching prerogative.

3. An allowance of food at a certain rate; an allowance of food stately given out; a ration, as to a family, to servants, to horses, &c.; hence, the state of being kept at a certain rate and regularly fed and tended; as, to keep horses at livery.

What livery is, we by common use in England know well enough, namely, that it is allowance of horse-meat, as they commonly use the word in stabling; as to keep horses at livery, the which word, I guess, is derived of livering or delivering forth their nightly food.

4. (a) The badge or uniform clothing given by barons and others to their retainers when in military service; and hence, sometimes a division of an army distinguished from another division by such badge or uniform. (b) The peculiar dress by which the servants of a nobleman or gentleman are distinguished; as, a claret-coloured livery. (c) The peculiar dress or garb assumed by any class or association of persons to their own use; as, the livery of the tradesmen of London, of a priest, of a charity-school, and the like; also, the whole body or association of persons wearing such a garb; as, the whole livery of London.

From the periodical deliveries of these characteristic articles of servile costume (blue coats) came our word livery.

(d) Any characteristic dress, or a dress assumed for or worn upon a particular occasion; hence, characteristic covering or outward appearance; as, the livery of May or of autumn.

Now came still evening on, and twilight gray
Had in her sober livery all things clad.

Thou basely thrust'st into lobspound. Hudibras.

Lobster (lob'stër), n. [A Sax. loppestere, lopystre, lopystre, corrupted from L. locusta, a kind of lobster or crayfish, also a locust.] The common name of the macrurus, decapodous, stalk-eyed crustaceans belonging to the genus Homarus. They have two pairs of antennae, the outer pair remarkably long. The mouth, as in all crustaceans, is vertical, and furnished with jaws and foot-jaws. The first pair of ambulatory limbs bear the well-known and formidable lobster-claws. The fifth ring of the thorax is soldered to the carapace. The abdomen has rudimentary limbs on its under side, among which are lodged the newly excluded spawn. The tail consists of several flat shelly plates capable of being spread like a fan, and used as a swimming organ. When one of the limbs is broken off it will be reproduced in a few weeks, but the new one is never quite as large as the old one. They change their shell periodically. They inhabit the clearest water, living in the crevices of a rocky bottom. The common lobster (H. vulgaris) is found in great abundance on many of the European shores. Lobsters are esteemed a very rich and nourishing aliment, but dangerous unless fresh and in good condition. They are generally in their best season from the middle of October till the beginning of May. A species allied to ours is found on the coasts of North America. The sea crayfish, or spring lobster, is the Palinurus vulgaris of zoologists. The fresh-water lobster (Astacus fluviatilis) is called crawfish or crayfish, and is chiefly distinguished by having the fifth thoracic ring movable.

Lobster-moth (lob'stër-moth), n. See STAU-ROBUS.

Lobular (lob'û-lër), a. Having the character, nature, or form of a lobule or small lobe.

Lobulated (lob'û-lät-ed), a. Consisting of lobules or small lobes; having small lobed divisions.

Locally (lō'kal-i), adv. With respect to place; in place; as, to be locally separated or distant.

We may discern a certain analogy between the perpetration of a particular form of Christianity and the perpetration of a particular language. Both prevail locally, and are transmitted by a faithful tradition from father to son.
Sir G. C. Lewis

Locate (lō'kāt), v. t. pret. & pp. located; ppr. locating. [L. loco, locatum, from loco, a place.] 1. To set in a particular spot or position; to place, to settle.

She was already 'of a certain age,' and, despairing of a lover, accepted the good old country squire, and was located for the rest of her life as mistress of Linstead Abbey.
Farrar

2. To select, survey, and settle the bounds of, as a particular tract of land; to designate by limits, as a portion of land; as, to locate a tract of a hundred acres in a particular township. [United States.] 3. To designate and determine the place of, as, a committee was appointed to locate a church or a court-house. [United States.]

Locate (lō'kāt), v. i. To reside, to place one's self or to be placed; to adopt or form a fixed residence.

Between whatever roof they locate, they disturb the peace of mind and happiness of some coexisting female.
De Quincey

Location (lō'kā'shun), n. 1. The act of placing or settling. 2. Situation with respect to place; place.

To say that the world is somewhere, means no more than that it does exist; this, though a phrase borrowed from place, signifying only its existence, not location.
Locke

3. In American law, the marking out of the boundaries or identifying the place or site of a piece of land according to the description given in an entry, plan, map, and the like. 4. In the United States, that which is located; a tract of land designated or marked out in place. 5. Lock (lok), n. [A Sax. leo, a lock or fastening of a door, an inclosure; lecan, locon, to lock, to fasten; loel, loet, a cover, shutter; leim, to close; laba, to shut, to bring to an end; lyta, to lock, to shut in, Dan. lukke, D. lukken, to shut or close. Perhaps from root of L. legere, to bind.] 1. Anything that fastens, specifically, an appliance used for fastening doors, chests, drawers, &c. A good lock is the masterpiece in smithery, and requires much art and delicacy in contriving and varying the wards, springs, bolts, and other parts of which it is composed, so as to adjust them to places where they are serviceable, and to the various occasions of their use. The principle upon which all locks depend is the application of a lever to an interior bolt, by means of a communication from without, so that by means of the latter the lever acts upon the bolt, and moves it in such a manner as to secure the door or lid from being opened by any pull or push from without. The security of locks in general, therefore, depends on the number of impediments that can be interposed between the lever (the key) and the bolt which secures the door, and these impediments are known by the name of wards (which slip into corresponding grooves of the key), the number and intricacy of which are supposed to distinguish a good lock from a bad one. 2. In Arms, as a rifle, musket, &c., the mechanism, or the portion comprising the mechanism, by which the piece is discharged. 3. A fastening together, a closing of one thing upon another, a state of being fixed or immovable, also, a grapple in wrestling; a hug. 'All Albemarle Street closed by a lock of carriages.' De Quincey

They must be practised in all the locks and grips of wrestling, so as to be able to fight to tug or grapple, and to close.
Milton

4. A place shut in or locked up; an inclosure; a lock-up.

Shut up th' unwelcome contents in the lock.
Dryden

5. A barrier to confine the water of a stream or canal, an inclosure in a canal, with gates at each end, used in raising or lowering boats as they pass from one level to another. When a vessel is descending, water is let into the chambers of the locks till it is on a level with the higher water, and thus permits the vessel to enter; the upper gates

D. and Dan. lok, loal, loeth, G. loech, a curl or ringlet of hair. The further connections of the word are doubtful. 1. A tuft of hair or wool; a tress; a ringlet.

Locofoco (lò-kò-fò'kò), n. [A word intended to mean self-lighting (L. focus, a fire), and modelled after locomotive on the supposition that the latter word meant self-moving.] A self-igniting cigar or match. This term was sportively applied to the extreme portion of the Democratic party in the United States, because, at a meeting in Tammany Hall, New York, at which there was a great diversity of sentiment, the chairman left his seat, and the lights were extinguished, with a view to dissolve the meeting; when those who were in favour of extreme measures produced locofoco matches, rekindled the lights, continued the meeting, and accomplished their immediate object. Hence, the American radicals are called locofocos, or the locofoco party.

You would find a locofoco majority as much addicted to class legislation as a factitious aristocracy. Disraeli.

Locomotion (lò-kò-mò'shon), n. [L. locus, place, and motio, motion.] 1. The act of moving from place to place.

An excursion to London, upon the footing that locomotion then was, when an hundred miles was a journey of three days, was a matter of some importance. Graves.

A clock, a mill, a lathe moves; but as no change of place of the machine is produced, such motion is not locomotion. Brande & Cox.

2. The power of moving from place to place; as, most animals possess locomotion; plants have life but not locomotion.

Locomotive (lò-kò-mò'tiv), a. 1. Moving from place to place; changing place, or able to change place; as, a locomotive animal.

2. Having the power to produce motion, or to move from place to place; as, a locomotive organ of the body; a locomotive engine.

— Locomotive power, any kind of moving power, but especially steam, applied to the transport of loads on land. See RAILWAY.

Locomotive-engine (lò-kò-mò'tiv-en-jin), n. Any engine which, being employed to draw loads from one place to another, travels with the load which it draws; especially, a movable steam-engine used for the traction of carriages on a railway, or a movable steam-carriage for passengers or goods, either upon a common road or on a railway.

Locomotive-car (lò-kò-mò'tiv-kär), n. A locomotive and a railway carriage combined in one. [United States.]

Locus (lò'kus), n. pl. Loc (lò's), [L.] A place; specifically, (a) in geom. the line or surface traversed by a point which is constrained to move in accordance with certain determinate conditions; thus, the locus of a point which must preserve the same uniform distance from a fixed point is the surface of a sphere, but if the motion be at the same time confined to a plane, the locus will be a circle. (b) In optics, the figure formed by all the pencils of converging or diverging rays emanating from an object. — Locus delicti, a term in Scots law signifying the place where an offence is committed. — Locus penitentiae, time of repentance before a probative writing is executed. — Locus sigilli, indicating the place of the seal, usually appended, with a party's signature, to a public document: usually abbreviated into L.S. — Locus standi, recognized place or position; the right of a party to appear and be heard on the question before any tribunal.

Locust (lò'kust), n. [L. locusta. Origin unknown.] 1. The common name of several insects belonging to the section Saltatoria, of the order Orthoptera, of which the genus Locusta is a type. They are allied to the grasshoppers and crickets, but differ from them in their antennae being shorter, and their bodies and limbs being more robust. Their hind-legs are large and powerful, which gives them a great power of leaping. Their mandibles and maxillae are strong, sharp, and jagged, and their food consists of the leaves and green stalks of plants. They have coloured elytra and large wings disposed when at rest in straight folds. They fly well, but are often conveyed by winds where their inherent power could not have carried them. Their ravages are well known. Locusts are eaten in many countries roasted or fried. They are often preserved in lime or dried in the sun. The most celebrated species is the migratory locust (L. migratoria). It is about 2½ inches in length, greenish, with brown wing-covers marked with black. Migratory locusts are most usually found in Asia and Africa, where they frequently swarm in countless numbers, darkening the air in their excursions, and devouring every blade of the vegetation of the land they light on. In the United States the harvest-fly (Cicada) is called a locust. — 2. See LOCUST-TREE.

Locust (Locusta migratoria).

Locusta (lò-kus'tà), n. [L.] In bot. (a) a term sometimes applied to the spikelet of grasses. (b) An inflorescence in which the flowers are sessile, and arranged upon a lengthened axis which is permanent.

Locustelle (lò-kus-tel'), n. A name given to some of the birds of the family Sylviidae, from their note resembling that of the grasshopper (the Locusta of some naturalists). Called also Grasshopper Warbler.

Locustids (lò-kus'ti-dè), n. pl. The locust family, a group of orthopterous insects belonging to the class Saltatoria. See LOCUST.

Locust-tree (lò'kust-trè), n. A tree, the Robinia pseud-acacia; also, Ceratonia Siliqua and Ceratonia Hymenaea Courbaril. The honey locust-tree is Gleditsia triacanthos: so called from the sweet pulp found between the seeds in the pod. See GLEDITSCHIA and HYMENEA.

Logging, v. A logging. Log-saw (log'sô), n. Naut. The saw-glass used in heaving the log to obtain the rate of sailing. It is commonly a half-minute or a 25-second glass for slow sailing, and 14-second for fast sailing.

Log-heap (log'hêp), n. A pile of logs for burning in clearing land.

Log-house, Log-hut (log'hôus, log'hut), n. Same as Log-cabin.

Logic (loj'ik), n. 1. Fr. logique, L. logica, Gr. logikê from logos, reason. 1. The science of reasoning, the science of the operations of the understanding subservient to the estimation of evidence, including both the process itself of advancing from known truths or admitted propositions to unknown truths or propositions not previously admitted, and all intellectual operations, such as classifying and judging, subsidiary to this, the science whose chief end is to ascertain the principles on which all valid reasoning depends, and which may be applied as tests of the legitimacy of every conclusion that is drawn from premises.

Logic is the science of the laws of thought, so thought, that is, of the necessary conditions to which thought, considered in itself, is subject.

By logic has generally been meant a system which teaches us so to arrange our reasonings that their truth or falsehood shall be evident to their hearers.

Logic is not the science of belief, but the science of proof or evidence. In so far as belief pretends to be founded on proof, the office of logic is to supply a test for ascertaining whether or not the belief is well grounded.

2. Reasoning, the practice of reasoning, as the author is guilty of much bad logic. De ductive logic, the science which treats of deductive reasoning. See under DEDUCTIVE. — Inductive logic, the science which treats of inductive reasoning. See INDUCTION. — Pure logic the science of logic proper, as distinguished from applied logic, which is the science of logic as applied to some special branch of inquiry or field of investigation, or from medley logic which treats of the practice of reasoning as modified by the mental constitution of man generally or particular individuals, or the practice of reasoning in relation to those circumstances which are likely to lead men into error in reasoning.

Logical (loj'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to logic used in logic taught in logic, as, logical sublimity. — 2. According to the rules or principles of logic, as, a logical argument or inference, this reasoning is strictly logical. A process of logical reasoning has been often likened to a chain supporting a weight. Sermon.

3. Skilled in logic, furnished with logic, discriminating, as, a logical mind. Logically (loj'ik-al-ly), adv. According to the rules or principles of logic; as, to argue logically.

Logician (loj'ik-yan), n. A person skilled in logic, a teacher or professor of logic, an able arguer.

Each logic / logician still expelling Logic. Agon.

Logistics (loj'ik-sis), a. 1. To exercise one's logical powers.

Logistics is not speaking and Agonizing: it is seeing and not reasoning.

Logistics is not speaking and Agonizing: it is seeing and not reasoning.

Logistics is not speaking and Agonizing: it is seeing and not reasoning.

Logist (loj'ik-sis), n. Used for Logist.

Logist (loj'ik-sis), n. A bit of hollowed-out paper polished in various concavities and used as theatrical jewelry. [Theatrical slang.]

Logistic (loj'ik-sis), a. 1. Math. Relating to logic, arithmetic; as, logistic arithmetic. Logistic or proportional logistics, certain logarithms of sexagesimal fractions useful in astronomical calculations. They are constructed for the purpose of simplifying the process of finding a fourth proportional where the first term is always the same. By the ordinary logarithmic tables it would be necessary in such a case first to find the logarithms of the second and third terms and add them together and then to subtract the logarithm of the first, by which the logarithm of the fourth is determined. But in tables of logistic logarithms the figures given are the excesses of the logarithm of the first term over the logarithms of the numbers that may form the second and third terms, so that the process is reduced to adding the logistic logarithms of the second and third terms, which gives the logistic logarithm of the fourth. Tables of logistic logarithms were formerly used in connection with the old Nautical Almanac for simplifying astronomical calculations at sea, but they are now almost entirely disused, tables being now compiled that make it quite as convenient to use the common logarithms.

Logistics (loj'ik-sis), n. 1. A name sometimes employed for the arithmetic of sexagesimal fractions, used in astronomical computations. Called also Logistical Arithmetic. 2. Naut. that branch of military science which takes cognizance of the comparative warlike resources and capabilities of countries between which war is likely to arise, as well as of all the conditions under which it is likely to be conducted, as the geographical features, climate, means of transit, food resources, &c., of the probable cost of war.

Log-line (loj'lin), n. Naut. A line or cord about 150 fathoms in length, fastened to the log by means of two logs, and wound on a reel, called the log-reef. See Log.

Logman (log'man), n. 1. A man who carries logs. Shak. — 2. One whose occupation is to cut and convey logs to a mill. [United States.]

Logocracy (loj'ok-ro-si), n. [Gr. logos, a word, and kratos, to rule.] Government by the power of words.

Logodically (loj'ok-dik-ly), a. [Or logos, a word, and dokein, to think or curiously wrought.] Verbal logodically; a playing with words, as by passing from one meaning of them to another. [Rare.]

For one instance of logodically I could bring ten instances of logodically or verbal logodically.

Logogram (loj'ok-gram), n. [Or logos, a word, and gramma, a letter, from graphein, to write.] 1. In photography, a word letter, a phonogram that, for the sake of brevity, represents a word, as, that is, t, for it. — 2. A set of verses forming a puzzle. The verses contain words synonymous with certain others formed from the transposition of the letters of an original word, which last it is the object to find out. Thus out of the word certain many shorter words may be formed, as cur, curt, cut, tin, turn, &c., of which dog, short, shell, fruit, whitened, mountain-lake, &c., may be regarded as synonyms. These latter synonyms then are introduced into the poem, and from these the primary synonyms (cur, cut, &c.) are to be guessed, and from them again certain words.

Logographer (loj'ok-gra-fer), n. One skilled in logography.

Logographic, Logographical (loj'ok-graf-ik loj'ok-graf-ik-al), a. Pertaining to logography.

Logography (loj'ok-gra-fi), n. [Or logos, a word, and graphein, a writing.] 1. A method of printing, in which a type represents a word, instead of forming a letter. — 2. A system, formerly attempted of taking down the words of an orator without having recourse to short-hand, a number of reporters acting at once, each of whom in succession took down a few words.

Logorhaphy, Logoraphy (loj'ok-graf-ik), n. [Or logos, a word, and graphein, a writing, -ness, anything intricate.] A sort of riddle.

Macmillan's Mag.

Logomania (lō-gō-mă-nī-a), n. [Gr. logos, a word, and mania, madness.] A disease of the faculty of language generally associated with organic disease of the nervous structure, as in paralysis. In this disease, while conceptions and ideas remain clear, the power of associating these with the words by which they are expressed is lost, and the patient can either not give any names to his conceptions at all or expresses them erroneously. Sometimes one class of words is lost and others retained. Thus a patient may forget his own name, or nouns only, and remember all other words. Sometimes he forgets only parts of the word, as terminations, and not unfrequently in another form of the disease he inverts his phrases.

Logometer (lō-gō-mē-tēr), n. [Gr. logos, ratio, and metron, a measure.] A scale for measuring chemical equivalents.

Logometric, Logometrical (lō-gō-mē-trik, lō-gō-mē-trī-āl), a. Used to measure or ascertain chemical equivalents; pertaining to a logometer, as, a logometric scale.

Logos (lō-gōs), n. [Gr. logos, word, speech, reason, from legō, to speak.] The Word; the Divine Word, Christ.

Logothete (lō-gō-thēt), n. [Gr. logos, a word, account, and thētēs, to place.] Property, an accountant, hence, an officer of the Byzantine Empire, who might be either (a) the public treasurer, (b) the head of any administrative department; or (c) the chancellor of the empire. Gibbon.

Logotype (lō-gō-tīp), n. [Gr. logos, a word, and typos, impression.] A name given to two or more letters cast in one piece, as f, fl, a, o, u, de.

Log-roll (lō-gō-rōl), n. A reel on which the log-line is wound. See Log.

Log-roll (lō-gō-rōl), v. t. (United States.) 1. To assist in rolling and collecting logs for burning. Hence—2. To give mutual assistance in carrying measures, especially legislative measures.

Log-ship (lō-gō-ship). See LOG-SHIP.

Log-slats. See LOG-SLATS.

Logthing (lō-gō-ting), n. [Icel. log, law, and thing, assembly.] The legislative portion of the Norwegian storting or diet, consisting of one-fourth of the members of the storting, who sit apart from the other three-fourths constituting the adelsorting or representatives of landed property. The members of the logthing form, together with the highest judicial authorities, the supreme court of the kingdom.

Logwood (lō-gō-wūd), n. [From being imported in logs.] The popular English name of Hæmatostylon campechianum, a tree found very commonly in many parts of the West Indies, where it has been introduced from the adjoining continent, especially texture and a red colour, and so heavy as to sink in water. It is much used in dyeing, and its colouring matter is derived from a principle called hæmatine or hæmatophthine. Logwood contains, besides resin, oil, acetic acid, salts of potash, a little sulphate of lime, alumina, peroxide of iron, and manganese. It is employed in calico-printing to give a black or brown colour, and also in the preparation of some lakes. An extract of logwood is used in medicine as an astringent.

Lohoch, Lohock (lō-hōk), n. A medicine of a middle constance between a soft electuary and a styptic. See LOCH.

Lolmis (lōlm'ik), n. [Gr. lolmis, contagious matter.] Relating to the plague or contagious disorders.

Loin (lōin), n. [O. Fr. loigne, Fr. longe, a loin, as of veal, lambs, the loin, from L. lombus, the loin. The O.E. lend, A. Sax. lend, lenda (G. and D. lende, Icel. and Dan. lend), the loin, has disappeared in favour of this word, the more readily probably from a certain similarity of form.] The part of an animal which lies between the lowest of the false ribs and the upper portion of the ossa flum or haunch bone, or one of the lateral portions of the lumbar region. The loins are also called the Reins.

Lolterer (lō-lēr-ēr), n. A lingerer; one that delays or is slow in motion, an idler; one that is sluggish or dilatory.

How tedious answers, that offend
We cannot, no trust, no duty, and no friend. Pope

Lotteringly (lō-lēr-ing-lī), adv. In a loltering manner.

Lok, Lok (lōk, lōk'), n. [Icel., signifying originally a deceiver, from leka, O. Icel. leka, to lure, to entice.] In the Somnabulian myth the evil deity, the author of all calamities. He is said to be the father of Hela, goddess of the lower regions.

Lok (lōk), n. [Allied to lok, A. Sax. leona, to shut.] [Provincial] 1. A wicket or hatch. 2. A private road or path. Hall'sell.—3. A close narrow lane.

Lok, n. A lock of hair or wool. Dryden.
Loka, v. t. To see, to look upon. Chaucer.
Lok, n. Loka, v. p. of lock or loka. Looked; shut close. Chaucer.

Loligide (lō-lī-gīd), n. [See LOLIGO.] Carpenter's name for the family Teuthidae, comprising the calamaries or squids. See TEUTHIDA.

Loligo (lō-lī-gō), n. [L., a cuttle-fish.] A genus of cuttle-fishes. See CALAMARY.

Lolium (lō-lī-um), n. [L.] A genus of grasses of the tribe Poaceæ, containing a few species common in many parts of the northern hemisphere. One species (L. perenne) is the common rye-grass of the farmer, one of the most valuable of our pasture grasses; another species is L. temulentum, or darnel, which was long believed to have poisonous narcotic qualities, these, however, are now shown to have no existence in fact.

Loll (lōl), v. t. [Icel. lolla, to loll, lolla, to toddle as a child beginning to walk. Wedg. wood thinks the original idea is that of loll-ing or lolling out the tongue, whence the idea of imperfect speech (as in Pavarian loll, to speak thick), and lastly of imperfect action.] 1. To lie at ease; to lie in a careless attitude; to recline; to lean.

Vain of care, he lolles supine in state. Dryden.
2. To hang extended from the mouth, as the tongue of an ox or a dog when heated with labour or exertion.

The triple power of the Brython east,
With lolling tongue lay flaring at thy feet. Dryden.

2. To suffer the tongue to hang extended from the mouth: said of the animal that does so.

Loll (lōl), v. i. To suffer to hang out, as the tongue.

Flowers figures coughed around, and lolled their flowing tresses. Dryden.

Lollard (lōl'ārd), n. [Either from loll, and meaning originally a lary fellow, a sluggard, or from L.O. lollen, lullen, to sling, to sling, from the practice of the original Lollards of singing dirges at funerals. Others derive the term from an early German reformer of the name of Lollard or Leihard, who was burned at Cologne in 1381.] 1. One of a semi-monastic society for the care of the sick and the burial of the dead, originating at Antwerp about 1300, and not quite extinct yet. They were blamed for holding heretical opinions, and hence perhaps the application of the term in the following sense.—2. One of the followers of Wickliffe in England, who were persecuted in the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V.

Dr. Wickliffe dying at Lutterworth, Dec. 31, 1384, his followers were soon after dispersed, or rather approached, by the sickness of Lollards. Lewis.

Lollardism, Lollardy (lōl'ārd-izm, lōl'ārd-iz), n. The principles or doctrines of the Lollards.

The spirit of Popery, not Christianity, was to be seen in the zeal of the enemies to Lollardy. Young.

Loller, n. A Lollard. Chaucer.

Lollingly (lōl-ing-lī), adv. In a lolling manner.

She (Desire) has four arms, with one of which she carries the shield of a giant, her tongue protrudes, and hangs lollingly from the mouth. Boswell.

Lollipop (lōl'pōp), n. [Explained by Wedgwood as meaning a dainty for sucking, from stem of L. loll, lull, to protrude the tongue, and pop, pops, 'the infantine expression for sucking. Comp. L.O. ruckerpopp, sweetmeats. Lolly seems to mean a soft kind of food, as in lolly, and pop is probably the same as pop, infants' food.] A kind of sugar confectionery which dissolves easily in the mouth.

Lollop (lō-lōp), v. t. [From loll.] To move heavily; to lounge. [Low]

Lomaria (lō-mă-rī-a), n. [Gr. lōma, a hem, fringe, or border.] A genus of ferns closely allied to the blechnum, from which it is distinguished by having the sori situated along the margin of the fronds, while in the blechnum they are situated within the margin.

Lombard (lōm'bārd), n. [L.L. Lombardus, severally translated as Long beard, being regarded as a latinized form of the German words for long and beard. Another etymology is G. lang or L. longus, long, and O.E. burg, part, a battle-axe. Comp. Adhart, partisan. But see the following extract.

*Passus Diacorus, who was a Lombard by birth, derives their name of Lombards from their long beards, but modern critics reject this etymology, and suppose the name to have reference to their dwelling on the banks of the Elbe, whence as Schöer explains in Low German a fertile plain on the bank of a river, and there still a district in Mecklenburg called the langa Elbe. *Smith's Chæst. Diet.

1. A native of Lombardy in Italy.—2. A banker or money-lender: so called because this profession was first exercised in London by natives of Lombardy. 2. 1844, a kind of mansion formerly used—Lombard Street, a street in London where a large number of the principal bankers, money-brokers, and bullion-dealers have their offices; hence, the money market or the moneyed interest of London.

Lombard, Lombard-house (lōm'bārd, lōm'bārd-hōus), n. A public institution for lending money to the poor at a moderate interest upon articles deposited and pledged. Called also Mont-de-piété.

Lombard (lōm'bārd), n. Of or pertaining to Lombardy or the Lombards.—Lombard architecture, the form which the Romanesque style of architecture assumed under the hands of the Gothic invaders and colonists of the north of Italy, comprising the buildings erected from about the beginning of the ninth to the beginning of the thirteenth century. It forms a connecting link between the romanized architecture of Italy and the Gothic of more northern countries. The most characteristic feature of the churches built in this style is the general introduction and artistic development of the vault, that feature which afterwards became the formative principle of the whole Gothic style. In the Lombard architecture also pillars consisting of several shafts arranged round a central mass, and buttresses of small proportion, appear to have been first employed. The tendency to the prevalence of vertical lines throughout the design, instead of the horizontal lines of the classic architecture, is also characteristic, as well as the use of the dome to surmount the intersection of the choir nave and transepta. See also extract below.

Generally speaking the most beautiful part of a Lombard church is its eastern end. The apse with its gallery, the transepts, and, above all, the dome that almost invariably surmounts their intersection with the choir, constitute a group which always has a pleasing effect, and is very often highly artistic and beautiful.

Lombardeer (lom'bård-ēr), n. A Lombard or pawbroker. Hovell.

Lombardic (lom'bård'ik), a. Pertaining to Lombardy or the Lombards — Lombardic alphabet, an alphabet derived from the Roman, and employed in the manuscripts of Italy.

Loment, Lomentum (lō'ment, lō-men'tum), n. In bot. an indehiscent legume which separates spontaneously by a transverse articulation between each seed.

Lomentaceæ (lō-men-tā'sē-ē), n. pl. [From lomentum (which see).] A sub-order of Cruciferae, the allique of which resembles a lomentum in having each seed divided from its neighbour by a transverse dissepiment. The common British plants jointed-charlock (Raphanus Raphanistrum) and purple sea-rocket (Oakle maritima) belong to this sub-order.

Lomentaceous (lō-men-tā'shūs), a. Bearing lomenta; like a loment; pertaining to a loment.

Lomonite (lom'on-it), n. Laumonite or di-prismatic zeolite.

Lomp (lump), n. Same as Lumpfish.

Lomplish (lompl'ish), a. Lumpish; heavy. 'His lomplish head.' Spenser.

Londe, n. Land.

Londenoy, n. A Londoner; one born in London. Chaucer.

Londinium (lon-din'ium), n. Roman name for London.

London-clay (lun'dun-klā), n. The most considerable of the eocene tertiary formations of Great Britain is thus designated from its development in the valley of the Thames under and around the metropolis. This formation consists of a bluish or blackish clay lying immediately over the plastic clay and sand, and rests unconformably on the chalk. It contains layers of ovate or flatish masses of argillaceous nodular limestone called septaria limestone or cement-stone. The shells of the London-clay mostly belong to genera now inhabiting warmer seas than those of Britain.

Londoner (lun'dun-ēr), n. A native or citizen of London.

Londenism (lun'dun-izm), n. A mode of speaking or acting peculiar to London.

Londenize (lun'dun-iz), v. t. To invest with some attribute characteristic of London or the people of London.

Londenize (lun'dun-iz), v. i. To imitate the manner or fashions of Londoners.

London-pride (lun'dun-prid), n. A British plant of the genus Saxifraga, the S. umbrosa. It is a plant common in every cottage-garden; also known by the name of None-so-pretty.

London-rocket (lun'dun-rok-et), n. Sisymbrium Irio, a plant which grows in waste places throughout Europe, and was formerly common in the neighbourhood of London, first appearing just after the great fire.

London-white (lun'dun-whit), n. White-lead.

Lone (lōn), a. [Probably a contr. from alone, so that it consists of one preceded by the l of O.E. al, Mod. E. all; comp. however, icel. laun, secrecy (from ljuga, to tell a lie), Dan. lōn, secretly, Goth. ga-launa, concealed.] 1. Solitary; retired; unfrequented; not often visited by men; having few or no inhabitants.

Loneliness (lōn'lī-nes), n. 1. The condition of being lonely; solitude; retirement; seclusion from company; as, he was weary of the loneliness of his habitation. — 2. Sadness for want of company or sympathy.

Uphold me, Father, in my loneliness. Tennyson.

3. Love of retirement; disposition to solitude.

Now I see
The mystery of your loneliness. Shak.

Lonely (lōn'lī), a. 1. Unfrequented by men; solitary; retired; sequestered; as, a lonely situation. — 2. Not having others near; apart from fellows or companions; as, the lonely traveller. — 3. Sad from want of companionship or sympathy.

Right through his manful breast darted the pang
That makes a man, in the sweet face of her
Whom he loves most, lonely and miserable. Tennyson.

4. Addicted to solitude or seclusion from company.

When, fairest princess,
You lonely thus from the full court retire,
Love and the graces follow to your solitude. Rome.

SYN. Solitary, lone, lonesome, retired, unfrequented, sequestered, secluded.

Loneness (lōn'nes), n. Solitude; seclusion.
Lonesome (lōn'sum), a. Solitary; secluded from society; dreary from want of company or animation.

How horrid will these lonesome seats appear!

Blackmore.

Lonesomely (lōn'sum-lī), adv. In a lonesome manner.

Lonesomeness (lōn'sum-nes), n. The state of being lonesome; solitude.

Long (long), a. [A Sax. lang, long, found in closely similar forms in all the Teutonic languages, into which it may have been borrowed at a very early period from the Latin longus, long, which is the only Indo-European word that can with certainty be connected with it.] 1. Drawn out in a line, or in the direction of length; opposed to short, and contradistinguished from broad or wide. Long is a relative term; for a thing may be long in respect to one thing, and short with respect to another. We apply long to things greatly extended, and to things which exceed the common measure. We say, a long way, a long distance, a long line, and long hair, long arms. By the latter terms we mean hair and arms exceeding the usual length. — 2. Drawn out or extended in time; lasting during a considerable time; as, a long time; a long period of time; a long while; a long sickness or confinement; a long session; a long debate. — 3. Extended to any specified measure; as, a span long; a yard long; a mile long, that is, extended to the measure of a mile, &c. — 4. Happening or occurring after a protracted interval.

Death will not be long in coming. Eccles. xiv. 12.
That we may us reserve both fresh and strong
Against the tournament which is not long.

5. Containing a great quantity of verbal matter; as, the book is far too long.

A tale should never be too long. Prior.

6. Continued in a series to a great extent; as, a long succession of princes; a long line of ancestors. — 7. Continued in sound; protracted; as, a long note; a long syllable. — 8. Lingering and longing.

Praying for him, and casting a long look that way,
He saw the galley leave the pursuit. Sir P. Sidney.

9. Extending far in prospect or into futurity; far-seeing.

The perennial existence of bodies corporate and their fortunes are things particularly suited to a man who has long views. Burke.

— Long home, the grave or death. Eccles. xii. 5.

— In the long run, the whole course of things taken together; hence, in the ultimate result. — Long cloth, a kind of fine cotton or calico fabric made milled and plain.

group of wading birds (Grallatorae), characterized by the possession of long, slender, soft bills, grooved for the perforations of the nostrils. The legs are sometimes rather short, sometimes of great length, the toes are of moderate length, and the hallux is usually short and sometimes absent. The bill in these birds serves as an organ of touch, being used as a kind of probe to feel for food in mud or marshy soil. To fulfill this purpose the tip of the bill is furnished with numerous filaments of the 8th nerve. They feed mostly upon insects and worms, and are not strictly aquatic in their habits, mostly frequenting marshy districts, moors, fens, the banks of rivers or lakes, or the shores of the sea. This group comprises the snipes, sandpipers, curlews, rails, godwits, turnstones, avocets, &c.

Longish (long'ish), a. Somewhat long; moderately long.

Longitude (lon'ji-tid), n. [L. longitudo, from longus, long.] 1. Length; measure along the longest line.

The ancient did determine the longitude of all rivers which were longer than bread by the double of their latitude. Pliny.

2. Is any distance on the surface of the globe measured on an arc of the equator or a parallel of latitude, or, as more commonly defined, the arc or portion of the equator intercepted between the meridian of a place and some meridian selected as a starting-point in calculating longitude, and called the first meridian; otherwise, the angle between the meridian plane of one place and the meridian plane of another. In this country longitudes are reckoned from the meridian of the royal observatory at Greenwich, which is that most commonly adopted in the construction of maps, though the meridians of Paris, Ferro, and Washington are also employed. Longitude is either expressed in degrees, minutes, and seconds, or in time, for since any point of the earth's surface passes through 360° of longitude in twenty-four hours, 15° are equivalent to one hour. It is reckoned to 180° eastward or westward; thus Vienna is in lon. 16° 23' E. When the latitude and longitude of a place are known, its precise situation on the globe is known, and hence it is of great importance to mariners to be able to determine their latitude and longitude at any time. There are various ways of finding longitude at sea. One of the most common is by means of a chronometer which gives the Greenwich time at any place, while the local time at that place is found by observation of the sun, the difference giving the longitude in time. See LATITUDE. 3. In astronomy, the distance in degrees, reckoned from the vernal equinox, on the ecliptic, to a circle at right angles to it passing through the heavenly body whose longitude is designated. — Observer's longitude, in astronomy, the longitude of a heavenly body as reckoned on or referred to a circle, of which the centre is the same as that of the earth. — Heliocentric longitude, the longitude of a heavenly body as reckoned on or referred to a circle, of which the centre coincides with the sun's centre.

They received Ulysses and his followers hospitably, but the sweetness of the fruit induced such a feeling of happy languor that they forgot their native land and ceased to desire to return to it, their sole object being to live in delicious dreamy idleness in Lotus-land.

Lotos (lŏ'tŏs). Same as Lotus (which see).

Lottery (lŏt'er-ŏ), n. [Fr. loterie. See LOT.] 1. Allotment or distribution of anything by fate or chance; a procedure or scheme for the distribution of prizes by lot; the drawing of lots. In general, lotteries consist of a certain number of tickets drawn at the same time, some of which entitle the holders to prizes, while the rest are blanks. This species of gaming has been resorted to at different periods by most of the European governments as a means of raising money for public purposes. Both state and private lotteries were rendered illegal in this country in 1826, except in the case of art-unions, where the distribution by lottery of works of art was legalized.

So let high-sighted tyranny rage on,
Till each man drop by lottery. Shak.

2. The lot or portion falling to one's share. Octavia is A blessed lottery to him. Shak.

Lotus (lŏ'tus), n. [Gr. lŏtos.] 1. A name vaguely applied to a number of different plants famous in mythology and tradition. One of these is the Zizyphus Lotus, a native of Northern Africa and Southern Europe, belonging to the nat. order Rhamnaceæ. It is a shrub of 2 or 3 feet high, bearing a fruit, the jujube, which is a drupe of the size of a wild plum. This was probably the food of the Lotophagi of Homer, though some consider it was more probably the delicious berry of the Rhamnus Lotus, another North African shrub, while others refer it to the still better flavoured intoxicating berry of the Nitraria tridentata, still greatly prized by the Berbera. The name lotus was also given to several species of water-lily, as the blue water-lily (Nymphaea carulea), the Egyptian water-lily (N. Lotus), and to the nelumbo (Nelumbium speciosum), which grow in stagnant or slowly running waters. Nymphaea carulea and N. Lotus are often found figured on Egyptian buildings, columns, &c., and the nelumbo, or Hindu and Chinese lotus, bears a prominent part in the mythology of these countries.—

2 A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosae, consisting of creeping herbs and undershrubs, chiefly natives of temperate regions throughout the world. They have yellow, red, or white flowers, growing in umbels on axillary peduncles, and compound leaves of four or five leaflets. Four or five species are found in Britain, where they are known as bird's-foot trefoil. They resemble the clovers in their general properties.—3 In arch. an ornament in the form of the Egyptian water-lily (Nymphaea Lotus) frequently figured in the architecture of ancient nations, especially on the capitals of Egyptian columns.

to be coined till 1796. It ranged in value from about 16s. 7d. to 18s. 0d. sterling. Louis-Quatorze (lō-s-ka-tor-z), a. (Fr. Louis XIV.) The name given to a style of architecture and internal ornamentation prevalent in France in the reign of Louis XIV., especially applied to palaces and large mansions. Externally the forms are classical, freely treated, and rustication is much employed; the windows are larger and the rooms more lofty and spacious than in buildings of the period immediately preceding, and there is generally an effort at sumptuous elegance. The palaces of Versailles and the east front of the Louvre are prominent examples of the style. The most characteristic features of the Louis-Quatorze style, however, are seen in the internal ornamental decoration, the great medium of which was gilt stucco-work, and its most striking characteristics are an infinite play of light and shade, and a certain disregard of symmetry of parts and of symmetrical arrangement. The characteristic details are the scroll and shell. The classical ornaments, and all the elements of the Cinque-cento, from which the Louis-Quatorze proceeded, are admitted under peculiar treatment, or as accessories; the panels are formed by chains of scrolls, the concave and convex alternately, some clothed with an acanthus foliation, others plain.—Louis-Quinze (lō-s-ka-z) is the name for the variety of this style of ornament which prevailed in France during the reign of Louis XV. In it the want of symmetry in the details, and of symmetrical arrangement, which characterize the Louis XIV. style, are carried to an extreme. An utter disregard of symmetry, a want of attention to masses, and an elongated treatment of the foliations of the scroll, together with a species of crimped conventional shell-work, are characteristics of this style.

Love-cause (lū'v-kāz), n. A love-affair. Shak.

Love-charm (lū'v-chārm), n. A charm by which love was supposed to be excited; a philtre.

'But what, said Nydia, 'can induce the beautiful tion, the passion of love, and at the same time of reciprocating it. That only is lovely which is both lovable and loving. In the affection and exclamation which so often characterizes the phraseology of polite society, this unhappy word was seized upon and generalized in its application, and it soon became the one epithet of commendation in young ladies' seminaries and similar circles, where it was and is applied indiscriminately to all pleasing material objects, from a piece of plumcake to a Gothic cathedral. Ruskin unobscurely adopted this school-girl triviality, and, by the popularity of his writings, has made it almost universal. G. P. Marsh.

[There is no doubt that lovely, like other words, is often misapplied, but Mr. Marsh in the above extract would limit its meaning too much; it was certainly applied to inanimate objects long before Mr. Ruskin's day, as the extracts show.]—3. † Loving; tender. 'Seal the title with a lovely kiss.' Shak. Lovely (lŭv'ly), adv. So as to induce or excite love; very beautifully or pleasantly. 'Lovely fair.' Shak. 'Earth . . . lovely smiled.' Milton.

deals, the passion of love, and at the same time of reciprocating it. That only is lovely which is both lovable and loving. In the affection and exaltation which so often characterizes the phraseology of polite society, this unhappy word was seized upon and generalized in its application, and it soon became the one epithet of commendation in young ladies' seminaries and similar circles, where it was and is applied indiscriminately to all pleasing material objects, from a piece of plumcake to a Gothic cathedral. Ruskin unluckily adopted this school-girl triviality, and, by the popularity of his writings, has made it almost universal. G. P. Marsh.

[There is no doubt that lovely, like other words, is often misapplied, but Mr. Marsh in the above extract would limit its meaning too much; it was certainly applied to inanimate objects long before Mr. Ruskin's day, as the extracts show.]—3. † Loving; tender. 'Seal the title with a lovely kiss.' Shak.

Lubbar (lub'ard), n. A lubber. Sir W. Scott.

Lubber (lub'er), n. [Allied to looby, lob, W. lob, an unwieldy lump, a dull fellow, Ulabi, a clumsy fellow, a lubber.] A heavy, clumsy fellow; a sturdy drone; a clown; specifically, a term applied by sailors to one who does not know seamanship.

And lingering lubbers lose many a penny. Tusser.

—Lubber's point (naut.), a black vertical line drawn on the inside of the case of the mariner's compass. This line, and the pin on which the card turns, are in the same vertical plane with the keel of the ship, and hence the rhumb opposite to the lubber's point shows the course of the ship at any time. The lubber's point, however, deviates from its proper position when the ship is heeled over, hence seamen do not implicitly depend upon it, as indeed its name implies.

—Lubber's hole (naut.), the vacant space success; as, a luckless gamester; a luckless maid.

Prayers made and granted in a luckless hour.

Dryden.

LUNA (lū'na), n. [L. for luna, from lūno, to shine.] 1. The moon. 2. In old chem. silver. Luna cornua, fused chloride of silver, so called from its horn-like appearance.

Lunacy (lū'nā-si), n. [From L. lunaticus, lunatic, moon-struck, from luna, the moon.] A species of insanity or madness; properly, the kind of insanity which is broken by intervals of reason formerly supposed to be influenced by the changes of the moon, madness in general, lunacy, or any unsoundness of mind. Commission of lunacy. See under COMMISSION.

Lunacy, a commissioner appointed by statute to visit and superintend asylums and grant licenses to persons who wish to open houses for the reception of patients. SYN Insanity, derangement, craziness, mania.

Lunar (lū'nar), a. [L. lunaris, from luna, the moon.] 1. Pertaining to the moon, as, lunar observations. 2. Measured by the revolutions of the moon, as, lunar days or years. 3. Resembling the moon, round.

In the right hand a pointed dart they wield,
The left, her ward, contains a Lunar shield. Dryden.

4. Influenced by the moon.

They have designated some herbs lunar and some lunar, and such like toys put great worth on them. Bacon.

—Lunar bone, one of the bones of the wrist. —Lunar caustic, nitrate of silver. —Lunar cycle, the period of time after which the new moons return on the same days of the year. See CYCLE. —Lunar distance (navi astron.), a term denoting the distance of the moon from the sun, or from a fixed star or planet lying nearly in the line of its path, by means of which the longitude of a ship at sea is found. —Lunar method (navi astron.), the method of determining the longitude of a place or ship from the observation of lunar distances. —Lunar month. See MONTH. —Lunar observation generally means an observation of the moon's distance from a star for the purpose of finding the longitude. —Lunar tables (a) In astron. tables of the moon's motions arranged for computing the moon's true place at any time past or future. (b) In navigation, logarithmic tables for correcting the apparent distance of the moon from the sun, or from a fixed star on account of refraction and parallax. —Lunar theory the deduction of the moon's motion from the law of gravitation. —Lunar year. See YEAR.

Lunar (lū'nar), n. In navigation, lunar distance.

Lunaria (lū'nā-ri-a), n. [From L. luna, the moon.] A genus of biennial and perennial cruciferous herbs, natives of central and southern Europe, so called from the broad silvery dissepiments of the pod resembling a full moon. One of the species (L. biennis) is known by the English names of honesty or white flower. It is a tall erect biennial, with large cordate leaves and terminal racemes of purple or white flowers.

Lunarian (lū'nā-ri-an), n. An inhabitant of the moon.

Lunary (lū'nā-ri), n. Same as Lunar. Poet.

Lunary (lū'nā-ri), n. A plant, moonwort (which see).

Lunate, Lunated (lū'nāt, lū'nāt-ed), a. Having a form resembling that of the half-moon; crescent-shaped, as, a lunate leaf.

Lunatic (lū'nāt-ik), a. [L. lunaticus. See LUNACY.] 1. Affected by lunacy, med. insane, as, a lunatic person. 2. Indicating or exhibiting lunacy. 'Bedlam beggars, from low farms, sometimes with lunatic bans, sometimes with prayers.' Shak.

Lunatic (lū'nāt-ik), n. A person affected by lunacy, an insane person, properly, one who has lucid intervals; a person of unsound mind, a madman. —Lunatic asylum, a house or hospital established for the reception of lunatics.

Lunation (lū'nā-shun), n. [L. lunatio, lunaticus, from L. luna, lunatum, to bend like a half-moon or crescent, from luna, a moon.] The period of a synodic revolution of the moon, or the time from one new moon to the following.

Lunch (lunsh), n. [Prov. E., a lump or piece, probably a form of lump, as lunch of lump, burnt of lump, dunch (Sc.) of lump.] The use of the word to mean food taken between meals is paralleled by the common Scotch use of piece in this sense. A luncheon (which see).

Lunch (lunsh), v. t. To take a lunch.

Luncheon (lunsh'on), n. [A longer form of lunch, perhaps for lunching, or the termination may be borrowed from supper, which seems to be really a word of different origin altogether. See NUCHERON.] 1. A lump of bread, a slice.

I sliced the luncheon from the barley-bread. Gay. 2. A slight repast or meal between breakfast and dinner—formerly between dinner and supper, food taken at any time except at a regular meal.

Luncheon (lunsh'on), v. t. To take lunch or luncheon.

While ladies are luncheoning on Portland pie, or courting in whirling broken, performing all the singular ceremonies of a London morning in the heart of the season. Dryden.

Lunette, St. Paul's, London.

Lung (lung), n. [A Sax. lunga, pl. lungas, local lunga, lunga, D. lung, Dan. and G. lunga.] Wedge-shaped may be right in tracing the root-meaning to lightness or sponginess, seen in Sax. lung, lung, light. Comp. light.] 1. Is one of the two organs of respiration in air breathing animals. They are situated one on each side of the chest, and separated from each other by the heart and larger blood vessels. Each is inclosed in its own serous membrane, called the pleura. The general form of the lung is pyramidal, the base resting on the diaphragm, the apex extending to the base of the neck. Each lung is divided into two lobes by a deep transverse fissure near its middle, the upper lobe of the right lung being again partially Human Lungs, Heart, and great Vessels.

A. Lungs with the anterior vena turned back to show the heart and bronchia. B. Heart. C. Aorta. D. Pulmonary artery. E. Ascending vena cava. F. Trachea. G. G. Bronchia. H. H. Caudal aorta. I. I. Jugular vena. J. J. Subclavian arteries. K. K. Subclavian veins. P. P. Caudal cartilages. Q. Q. Anterior cardiac artery. N. N. Right auricle.

divided. The left lung is narrower than the right, but is somewhat longer. Their substance is light and spongy, and being filled with air cells floats readily on water. When the chest is expanded, the air, passing down the wind pipe into the capillary ramifications of the bronchi, acts on the blood that has been vitiated by circulation, exchanging gases with it through the walls of the air-vessels. Thus purified the blood returns to the left auricle of the heart, and the air, laden with carbonic acid, is expelled by the collapse of the chest. Among birds the lungs do not hang free in the cavity of the thorax, but are attached to the ribs and backbone, the bronchi opening into the air canals of the body. In reptiles the lungs are much more simple, but differ little from the mammal type. In serpents only one lung is fully developed, the other being rudimentary. In amphibians partially, and in fishes wholly, the lungs are replaced by gills. 2. pl. (a) A person having a strong voice. (b) A servant who blew the fire of an alchemist.

That is his fire-drake.

His lungs, his apophyses, he that puffeth his canals.

J. Young.

Lunule (lū'nūl), n. [L. lunula, dim. of luna, the moon.] Something in the shape of a little moon or crescent; as, (a) a crescent-like mark or spot on some bivalve shells. (b) In geom. a lune. See LUNE.

Lunulet (lū'nū-let), n. [L. lunula, dim. of luna, the moon.] In entom. a small spot in insects shaped like a half-moon, and differing in colour from the rest of the body.

Lunulite (lū'nū-lit), n. [L. luna, the moon, and Gr. lithos, a stone.] A small fossil coral: so called from its shape.

Lupercal (lū-pēr-kal or lū-pēr-kāl), a. [From Lupercal, a grove in the Palatine Hill sacred to Lupercus, identified by the Romans with the Lycæan Pan: so called because he ward off the wolves, from lupus, a wolf.] Pertaining to the Lupercalia, or feasts of the Romans in honour of Lupercus or Pan.

Lupercal (lū-pēr-kal or lū-pēr-kāl), n. pl. Lupercalia (lū-pēr-kāl'i-a). One of the most ancient of the Roman feasts, celebrated every year in the middle of February in honour of Lupercus.

You all did see, that on the Lupercal
I thrice presented him a kingly crown,
Which he did thrice refuse. Shak.

Lupiform (lū'pi-form), a. [L. lupus, a wolf, and forma, likeness.] Wolf-like: a characteristic designation of a form of syphilis, in which the clustered tubercles form patches of disorganized skin, and the surface is perforated by deep ulcerated pits.

Lupine (lū'pin), a. Like a wolf; wolfish; ravenous.

Lupine (lū'pin), n. [Fr. lupin; L. lupinus. See LUPINUS.] The common name of the plants of the genus Lupinus (which see).

Lupinine, Lupinite (lū'pin-in, lū'pin-it), n. A peculiar bitter substance extracted from the leaves of the Lupinus albus.

Lupinus (lū'pī-nus), n. [L., from lupus, a wolf, in allusion to its destroying or exhausting land.] A very extensive genus of hardy annual, perennial, and half-shrubby plants, some of which are commonly cultivated in gardens for the sake of their gaily-coloured flowers; the lupines. They belong to the natural Leguminosæ, and inhabit Europe, the temperate parts of North and South America, a few annual species being found in the Mediterranean region. The leaves are simple, digitate, or composed of many leaflets; the flowers are usually blue, violet, or varie-gated, more rarely pink, yellow, or white, in terminal racemes. L. albus is much grown in Italy and Sicily for forage, as well as for the seeds, which are used as food.

Lupous (lū'pus), a. Wolfish; like a wolf. [Rare.]

Lupulin, Lupuline (lū'pū-lin), n. [L. lupulus, hops.] 1. The peculiar bitter aromatic principle of the hop. Called also Lupulite. — 2. The fine yellow powder of hops, which contains the bitter principle. It consists of little round glands, which are found upon the stipules and fruit, and is obtained by drying, heating, and then sifting the hops. It is largely used in medicine.

Lupulite (lū'pū-lit), n. See LUPULIN, 1.

Lupus (lū'pus), n. [L., a wolf.] 1. In astron. one of the southern constellations, situated on the south of Scorpio. — 2. In med. a slow non-contagious tubercular affection, occurring especially about the face, and commonly ending in ragged ulcerations of the nose, cheeks, forehead, eyelids, and lips. It is so termed from its eating away the flesh. It is also called Noli-me-tangere. — Lupus metallorum, the alchemical name of stibnite or sulphide of antimony.

Lurch (lērch), n. [O. Fr. lourche, ourche, It. lurcio, G. lurz, lurtsch, a lurch at cribbage.] A term at the game of cribbage, denoting the position of a player who has not made his thirty-first hole when his opponent has pegged his sixty-first. The loser in such a case is said to be left in the lurch, in French expressed by il demeure lourche (Colgrave). Hence, to leave in the lurch, to leave in a difficult situation or in embarrassment; to leave in a forlorn state or without help. Colgrave.

Lurch (lērch), v. t. [A form of lurk, as church of kirk, birch of birk, bench of bank, &c. See LURK.] 1. To withdraw to one side or to a private place; to lie in ambush or in secret; to lie close; to lurk.

Fond of prowling and lurching out at night after their own sinful pleasures. Kingsley.

2. To shift; to play tricks.

I am fain to shuffle, to hedge, and to lurch. Shak.

3. To roll suddenly to one side, as a ship in a heavy sea; to stagger to one side, as a tipsy man.

Lurch (lērch), n. [See LURCH, v. t.] Naut. a sudden roll of a ship. — Lee lurch, a sudden roll to the leeward, as when a heavy sea strikes the ship on the weather side.

Lurch (lērch), v. t. [Partly based on LURCH, the gaming term, partly on LURK, v. t.] 1. To anticipate or outstep in acquiring something; to deprive of by anticipating; to rob.

You have lurch'd your friends of the better half of the garland by concealing the part of the plot. B. Jonson.

2. To take or gain privily or secretly before other competitors, or when others do not or cannot; to appropriate; to steal.

The fond conceit of something like a Duke of Venice, put lately into many men's heads by some one or other subtly driving on under this notion his own ambitious ends to lurch a crown. Milton.

3. To leave in the lurch; to deceive; to disappoint.

This is a sure rule, that will never deceive or lurch the sincere communicant. South.

Lurcht (lērch), v. t. [Comp. L. luroo, lurchio, to devour greedily. See also above.] To eat or swallow greedily; to eat up; to devour.

Too far off from great cities may hinder business; or too near lurcheth all provisions, and maketh everything dear. Bacon.

Lurcher (lērch'er), n. 1. One that lies in wait for larks; one that watches, as to steal, or to betray or entrap; a poacher.

Swift from his play the scudding lurcher flies. Gay.

Especially — 2. A dog that lies in wait for game, as hares, rabbits, partridges, fallow deer, &c., drives them into nets, runs them down or seizes them. This species of dog is said to be descended from the shepherd's dog and the greyhound, and is more used by poachers than sportsmen.

Lurcher (lērch'er), n. [See LURCH, to eat.] A glutton; a gourmandizer.

Lurdan, Lurdane (lēr'dan, lēr'dān), a. [O. Fr. lourdin, lourdein, from lourd, heavy, dull, thick-headed. See LOORD.] Blockish; stupid; clownish; lazy and useless.

In one chamber,
Red after revel, droned her lurdane knights Slumbering. Tennyson.

Lurdan, Lurdane (lēr'dan, lēr'dān), n. A clown; a blockhead; a lazy useless person.

Lure (lūr), n. [Fr. lurre, from M.H.G. luodar, a lure, G. luder, carrion, a bait for wild beasts.] 1. In falconry, an object somewhat resembling a bird thrown into the air to recall a hawk, often a bunch of feathers or several wings tied together and attached to a cord. The hawk being accustomed to get pieces of flesh to eat from the lure, this object comes to have a great influence on it, so that it will return when the falconer swings the lure about and whistles or calls. Hence — 2. Any enticement; that which invites by the prospect of advantage or pleasure. 'With a smile made small account of beauty and her lures.' Milton.

Lure (lūr), v. t. To call an animal, especially a hawk.

Standing near one that lured loud and shrill. Bacon.
At whatsoever hour of the day the boy lured for him, and called 'Limo,' were the dolphin never so close hidden, out he would, and come abroad. Holland.

Lure (lūr), v. t. pret. & pp. lured; ppr. luring. 1. In falconry, to attract by a lure, as a hawk; to attract to a lure by the voice.

O, for a falconer's voice,
To lure this tassel-gentle back again! Shak.

2. To entice; to attract; to invite by anything that promises pleasure or advantage. 'Lured on by the pleasure of this bait.' Sir W. Temple.

And various science lures the learned eye. Gay.

Lurid (lūr'id), a. [L. luridus.] Pale yellow, as flame; ghastly pale; gloomy; dismal.

All these thoughts of love and strife
Glimmered through his lurid life. Longfellow.

2. In bot. having a dirty brown colour, a little clouded.

Lurk (lēr'k), v. t. [Apparently corresponding to N. luska, Dan. luske, to lurk, to alk; allied to Dan. lur, G. lauer, an ambush or watching; perhaps to louer (v. t.), listen, &c. See LURCE, v. t.] 1. To lie hid; to lie in wait.

Let us lay wait for blood, let us lurk privily for the innocent. Prov. i. 11.

2. To lie concealed or unperceived.

The spectral form of an awful fate dominating all things human and divine might lurk in the background, but it did not obtrude itself or mar the fairness or completeness of that seemingly human life in which the spirit found satisfaction and rest. Dr. Caird.

Lurker (lēr'ēr), n. One that lurks or keeps out of sight.

Lurking-hole, Lurking-place (lēr'k-ing-hōl, lēr'k-ing-plās), n. A place in which one lurks or lies concealed; a secret place; a hiding-place; a den.

Lurry (lūr'i), n. [W. lurry, precipitant; lur, that tends forward.] 1. A confused throng; a crowd; a heap.

A lurry and rabble of poor farthing friars, who have neither rent nor revenue. World of Wonders.

2. A confused inarticulate sound or utterance; as, a lurry of words.

We are not to leave duties for no duties, and to turn prayers into a kind of lurry. Milton.

Lurry (lūr'i), n. A lorry. Lord Lytton.

Luscinia (lū-sin'i-a), n. A genus of insectivorous birds of the thrush family (Turdidae), to which the nightingale (L. philomela) belongs. See NIGHTINGALE.

Luscious (lūsh'us), a. [O.E. luscious. Comp. lush.] 1. Very sweet; delicious; grateful to the taste; pleasing; delightful.

And raisins keep their luscious native taste. Dryden.
He will bait him in with the luscious proposal of some gainful purchase. South.

2. Sweet or rich so as to cloy or nauseate; sweet to excess; hence, unctuous; fulsome.

He had a tedious, luscious way of talking, that was apt to tire the patience of his hearers. Jeffrey.

3. Smutty; obscene. [Rare.]

Lusciously (lūsh'us-ly), adv. In a luscious manner.

Lusciousness (lūsh'us-nes), n. The state or quality of being luscious.

Luserne (lū'sern), n. [Fr. loup-cervier, L. lupus-cervarius, deer-wolf — lupus, a wolf, and cervus, a stag.] A lynx.

Lush (lūsh), a. [Probably connected with lich, Sc. leish, vigorous, active, lush, lusty; the common derivation from luscious, and that from delicious, in O.E. sometimes written licious, may however be correct.] Fresh, luxuriant, and juicy; succulent.

How lush and lusty the grass looks! how green! Shak.
And at the root thro' lush green grasses burn'd
The red anemone. Tennyson.

Lush (lūsh), n. (Same origin as lushy (which see).) Intoxicating drink; especially beer. [Slang.]

MACAO (ma-ká'ko), n. 1. Same as Maki.—2. See MACAUB.

MACACUS (ma-ká'kus), n. A genus of Asiatic and African monkeys, belonging to the group Cercopitheciinae, characterized by short tails and prominent eyebrows. M. sinicus is the bonnet-macaque (which see). M. leoninus is the Barbary ape or magot, the only monkey found in Europe. It inhabits Egypt and Barbary and the rock of Gibraltar.

MACADAMIZATION (mak-ad'am-iz-á'shon), n. The act or art of macadamizing. Macadamization consists in covering the roadway or forming the road-crust with small broken stones to a considerable depth, and consolidating them by carriages working upon the road, or by rollers, so as to form a hard, firm, and smooth surface.

MACADAMISE (mak-ad'am-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. macadamized, ppr. macadamizing. [From Macadam, the inventor.] To cover, as a road, way, or path, with small broken stones. See MACADAMIZATION.

MACADAM-ROAD (mak-ad'am-ród), n. A road or path formed by macadamization (which see).

MACAO (ma-ká'ko), n. Same as MACAUS.

MACAQUE (ma-ká'k), n. [Fr.] A monkey of the genus Macacus (which see).

MACARIZE (mak-a-riz), v. t. [Gr. makarizō, to bless, from makar, blessed.] To bless; to pronounce happy; to wish joy to; to congratulate. [Rare.]

The word macarize has been adopted by Oxford men who are familiar with Aristotle to supply a word wanting in our language. It may be said that men are admired for what they are, commended for what they do, and macarized for what they have.

MACARONI (mak-a-ró'ni), n. pl. MACARONIS or MACARONES (mak-a-ró'niz). [Fr. and Prov. macaroni, It. maccheroni, originally a mixture of flour, cheese, and butter.

The use of the word in the 3d and 4th senses (as also of Macaroni, 2) is illustrated by the fact that in several countries a droll or comical fellow is called by the name of a favourite article of food, thus, the English Jack-pudding, the German Hanswurst (Jack Sausage), and the French Jean Farin (John Flour).] 1. A dough of fine wheaten flour made into a tubular or pipe form, varying from the thickness of a goose quill to an inch in diameter, which was first prepared in Italy, and introduced into commerce under the name of Italian or Genoese paste. It is a favourite food among the Italians.—2. A medley; something extravagant or calculated to please an idle fancy.—3. A sort of droll or fool.—4. A top; a beau; an exquisite; a dandy. The short period that the macaronies led the fashion dates from 1770 to about 1775. They were distinguished by an immense knot of artificial hair, a very small cocked hat, a walking-stick with long tassels, and a jacket, waistcoat, and small-clothes cut to fit the person as closely as possible. (See fig. in next col.)

You are a delicate Londoner; you are a macaroni; you can't ride. Barnwell.

Hence.—5. [American.] One of a body of Maryland troops in the revolution remarkable for their showy uniforms.

These were Haslet's Delaware and Smallwood's Maryland regiments, the latter the Macaronies, in scarlet and buff, who had outshone, in camp, their yeoman fellow-soldiers in homespun. W. Irving.

MACARONIAN (mak-a-ró'ni-an). Same as MACARONIC.

MACARONIC (mak-a-ró'nik), a. 1. Of or pertaining to the food macaroni.—2. Pertaining to or like a macaroni, hence, empty; trifling; vain; affected.—3. Consisting of a mixture or jumble of ill-formed or ill-connected words, or expressed in words of a barbarous or burlesque coinage, as of vulgar words Latinized or Latin words modernized; as, macaronic verse.—Macaronic verse or poetry, properly, a kind of humorous poetry in which, along with Latin, words of other languages are introduced with Latin inflections and construction. The name, however, is sometimes applied to verses which are merely a mixture of Latin and the unadulterated vernacular of the author. [The term was first employed to designate such verse by Teofilo Folengo, a Benedictine, who was born at Mantua 1494 and died 1544, and was selected with reference to the mixture of ingredients in the dish macaroni.]

MACARONIC (mak-a-ró'nik), n. 1. A confused heap or mixture of several things. 2. Macaronic verse.

MACARON (mak-a-rón), n. [Fr. macaron. See MACARONI.] 1. A small sweetcake, with among savage tribes. It was a favourite weapon with knights, with the cavalry immediately succeeding them, and at all times with fighting priests, whom a canon of the Church forbade to wield the sword. It consisted of a staff of about 5 feet long, with a metal head frequently in the form of a spiked ball. The heads, however, assumed a variety of forms, but all were constructed so as to inflict severe injury upon an opponent.—2. An ornamented staff of copper, silver, or other metal, resembling the warlike instrument, borne before magistrates and other persons in authority.—3. The heavier rod used in billiards.—4. Fig. a mace-bearer.

He was followed by the maces of the two houses. Macaulay.

5. A currier's mallet with a knobbed face, made by the insertion of pins with egg-shaped heads, used in leather-dressing to soften and supple the tanned hides and enable them to absorb the oil, &c.

MACC (má's), n. [Fr. macis, It. mace, L. macis, macis, the same with Gr. mace, an Indian spice.] A spice, the dried aril or covering of the seed of the nutmeg (Myristica fragrans), this covering being a fleshy net-like envelope somewhat resembling the husk of a filbert. When fresh it is of a beautiful crimson hue. It is extremely fragrant and aromatic, and is chiefly used in cooking or in pickles. See MYRISTICA.

MACC-ALE (má's-ál), n. Ale spiced with mace.

MACC-BEARER (má's-bár-ér), n. A person who carries a mace before public functionaries.

MACEDONIAN (mas-e-dó'ni-an), n. 1. A native or inhabitant of Macedonia. 2. A follower of Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, who, in the fourth century, denied the distinct existence and godhead of the Holy Spirit, which he conceived to be merely a divine energy diffused through the universe.

MACEDONIAN (mas-e-dó'ni-an), a. Belonging or relating to Macedonia.

MACC-PROOF (má's-prúf), a. Secure against arrest. Shirley.

MACER (má's-ér), n. A mace-bearer; specifically, in Scotland, an officer attending on the courts of session, teinds, justiciary, and exchequer. Macers are, properly speaking, the servants of the courts, and the attendants on the judges on the bench, and it is their duty to preserve silence in the court, to execute the orders of the judges, to call the rolls of court, and to execute such warrants for the apprehension of delinquents, &c., as are addressed to them.

but with ears longer and furnished with a pencil of hair, and tail shorter. The lynxes have been long famed for their sharp sight, which character they probably owe to their habit of prowling about at night, and their brilliant eyes. The European lynx is the F. lynx, the Canadian lynx is the F. canadensis. In Asia lynxes are famed for hunting—2. One of the northern constellations, situated directly in front of Ursa Major.

Lynx-eyed (línks'íd), a. Having acute sight.

Lyon-court (l'íon-kórt), n. One of the inferior courts of Scotland, having jurisdiction in questions regarding coat-armour and precedence, and also in certain matters connected with the executive part of the law. It is presided over by the lion-king-at-arms (which see).

Lyon-king-at- (or of-) arms. In Scotland, an officer who takes his title of Lyon from the armorial bearings of the Scottish kings, the lion rampant. The officers serving under him are heralds, pursuivants, and messengers. The jurisdiction given to him empowers him to inspect the arms and ensigns of all the noblemen and gentlemen in the kingdom, to distinguish the arms of the younger branches of families, and to give proper arms to such as deserve them; to matriculate such arms, and to fine those who use arms which are not matriculated. He also appoints messengers-at-arms, superintends them in the execution of their duty, takes cognisance of complaints against them, and fines, suspends, or deposes them for malversation. Called also Lord Lyon.

Lyra (l'íra), n. [L. and Gr. lyra.] 1. In astron. the Lyre, a constellation of the northern hemisphere, surrounded by Cygnus, Aquila, Hercules, and the head of Draco. Its principal star is a Lyre, of the first magnitude. 2. In anat. a portion of the brain, the medullary fibres of which are so arranged as to give it somewhat the appearance of a lyre.

Lyrate, Lyrate (l'írat, l'írat-ed), a. [From lyra.] In bot. shaped like a lyre, divided transversely into several sinuses, the lower ones smaller and more remote from each other than the upper ones; as, Lyrate Leaf, a lyrate leaf.

Lyre (l'íre), n. [Fr. lyre, L. and Gr. lyra. Etymology uncertain.] 1. One of the most ancient stringed instruments of music, differing from the others in that the neck of the former runs behind the upper part of the strings, while the strings of the latter are free on both sides. It was used by the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Greeks. It is said to have had originally only three strings. The number was afterward increased to seven, then to eleven, and finally to sixteen. 2. A constellation. See LYRA.

Various forms of Egyptian, Assyrian, and Greek Lyres.

Lyre (l'íre), n. [A. Sax. hleor, Icel. hlpr, the face, the countenance, the cheek.] The face; the countenance; the cheek; the skin, the complexion. Written also Líre, Lere, Leer.

Lyre-bird (l'írbérd), n. The Menura superba. See MENURA.

Ly (l'í), n. [From lyra.] 1. In astron. the Lyre, a constellation of the northern hemisphere, surrounded by Cygnus, Aquila, Hercules, and the head of Draco. Its principal star is a Lyre, of the first magnitude. 2. In anat. a portion of the brain, the medullary fibres of which are so arranged as to give it somewhat the appearance of a lyre.

They must have our lyricisms at their fingers' ends.

Lyrie (l'íre), n. [Icel. lyrie.] A name given in Scotland to the fish more commonly known as the armed bull-head.

Lyrist (l'írist), n. A musician who plays on the lyre or harp.

Lydimachia (l'í-dí-má'k'í-a), n. [Gr., perhaps from Lydimachus, general of Alexander the Great, and afterwards king of Thrace, or from a physician of this name. Pliny, however, speaks of the soothing and pacifying effects of the plant lysimachia upon oxen that will not draw in the same yoke, so that it may be directly from lysis, a loosening, and machia, strife, which in any case are the ultimate elements.] A genus of herbs, nat. order Primulaceae, containing about sixty species, which differ widely from each other in habit. They have entire, opposite, alternate, or whorled leaves, and axillary or terminal solitary or panicled white, yellow, or red flowers. Four species occur in Britain, known by the name of loosestrife, and one (L. nummularia) is called moneywort. They are chiefly natives of the temperate regions of the northern hemisphere.

M.

M is the thirteenth letter and tenth consonant of the English alphabet, and one of the consonants of the original Indo-European alphabet. It represents a labial and nasal articulation, the compression of the lips being accompanied with the fall of the uvula so as to allow the voice to form a humming sound through the nose, which constitutes the difference between this letter and b. Though this sound might seem to us one of the most simple and natural that the human organs can utter, there are peoples, as the Mohawks and other tribes of North America, who never give utterance to this or any other of the labials (Max Müller). The sound of this letter is quite uniform, being always that heard in man, time, rim. It is never silent in English words proper, though in some words from foreign sources it is not sounded, mnemonic (from the Greek) being one of the few examples. In a good many words it represents an original n, as in hemp = A. Sax. hænep, hænep, G. hanf; hamp = hanaper; tempt = L. tentare, time (the tree) = line (linden). On the other hand, an original m is in some words changed to n, as in count (n.) = L. comes, count (v.) = L. computare, ant = emmet (A. Sax. arnete), &c. This letter is rarely doubled except in composition and inflection, as immortal, dim, dimmed. After m, however, b sometimes forms a kind of doubling of the letter, as in number (L. numerus), timber (G. timmer). Musum is almost the only English word that ends in double m. — M as a numeral stands for 1000. With a dash or stroke over it, M, it stands for a thousand times a thousand, or 1,000,000. — In printing, M is a quadrate the face or top of which is a perfect square. It is the unit or measurement for the species of type used. See EM — It stands in abbreviations for various words, as A. M. or M. A. stands for Artium Magister, Master of Arts; M. D. for Medicine Doctor, Doctor of Medicine; A. M. for Anno Mundi, the year of the world; M.S. for manuscript; M.S.R. for manuscripts; M. P. Member of Parliament; &c. — M was formerly a brand or stigma impressed on one convicted of manslaughter and admitted to the benefit of clergy.

Ma (má), [It.] In music, but, as in the phrase, allegro, ma non troppo — fast, but not too much so.

Ma (má), n. A childish or shorter form of Mamma.

Ma'am (má'm), n. A common colloquial contraction for Madam.

Maaha (ma-ah'a), n. An East Indian coin, a little more than the tenth part of a rupee in weight.

Mab (mab), n. [W. mab, a child.] 1. A mythical personage, often represented as the queen of the fairies, though otherwise Titania holds that position. The exquisite description of Mab in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet is well known. — 2. A slattern. [Provincial.]

Mab (mab), v.t. To dress negligently; to be slatternly. [Provincial.]

Mabble (mab'l), v.t. To wrap up. See MOBLE.

Mabby (mab'bi), n. A spirituous liquor distilled from potatoes in Barbadoes.

Mac (mak), A Gaelic word signifying son, and prefixed to many surnames, as Mac Donald, Mac Grigor, &c. It is synonymous with Son in names of Teutonic origin, Fitz in names of Norman origin, with O in Irish, and with Mab or Map (shortened into Ab or Ap) in Welsh names. It is allied to Goth. magus, a son, fem. magath (G. magd, a maid), E. may, to be able.

The Fillets sometimes permitted themselves to speak with scorn of the O's and Mac's, and the O's and Mac's sometimes repaid that scorn with aversion. Maculay.

Macaco (ma-ká'ko), n. 1. Same as Maí. — 2. See MACAOS.

Macacus (ma-ká'kus), n. A genus of Asiatic and African monkeys, belonging to the group Cercopithecoidea, characterized by short tails and prominent eyebrows. M. sinensis is the bonnet-macaque (which see). M. leoninus is the Barbary ape or magot, the only monkey found in Europe. It inhabits Egypt and Barbary and the rock of Gibraltar.

Macadamization (mak-ad'am-iz-á'shon), n. The act or art of macadamizing. Macadamization consists in covering the roadway or forming the road-crust with small broken stones to a considerable depth, and consolidating them by carriages working upon the road, or by rollers, so as to form a hard, firm, and smooth surface.

Macadamize (mak-ad'am-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. macadamized; ppr. macadamizing. [From Macadam, the inventor.] To cover, as a road, way, or path, with small broken stones. See MACADAMIZATION.

Macadam-road (mak-ad'am-ród), n. A road or path formed by macadamization (which see).

Macao (ma-ká'o), n. Same as Macau.

Macaque (ma-ká'k), n. [Fr.] A monkey of the genus Macacus (which see).

Macarise (mak'a-riz), v. t. [Gr. makarizō, to bless, from makar, blessed.] To bless, to pronounce happy, to wish joy to; to congratulate. [Rare.]

The word macarise has been adopted by Oxford men who are familiar with Aristotle to supply a word wanting in our language. It may be said that men are admired for what they are, commended for what they do, and macarised for what they have. W. Hazlitt.

Macaroni (mak-a-ró'ni), n. pl. Macaronis or Macaronies (mak-a-ró'niz). [Fr. and Prov. It. macaroni, It. maccheroni, originally a mixture of flour, cheese, and butter. The use of the word in the 3d and 4th senses (as also of Macaron, 3) is illustrated by the fact that in several countries a droll or comical fellow is called by the name of a favourite article of food, thus, the English Jack-pudding, the German Hanswurst (Jack Sausage), and the French Jean Farine (John Flour).] 1. A dough of fine wheat flour made into a tubular or pipe form, varying from the thickness of a goose quill to an inch in diameter, which was first prepared in Italy, and introduced into commerce under the name of Italian or Genoese paste. It is a favourite food among the Italians. — 2. A medley, something extravagant or calculated to please an idle fancy. — 3. A sort of droll or fool. — 4. A fop; a beau; an exquisite; a dandy. The short period that the macaronies led the fashion dates from 1770 to about 1775. They were distinguished by an immense knot of artificial hair, a very small cocked hat, a walking-stick with long tassels, and a jacket, waistcoat, and small-clothes cut to fit the person as closely as possible. (See fig. in next col.)

You are a delicate Londoner; you are a macaroni; you can't ride. Barnett.

Hence — 5. [American.] One of a body of Maryland troops in the revolution remarkable for their showy uniforms.

These were Hazlett's Delaware and Smallwood's Maryland regiments; the latter the Macaronis, in scarlet and buff, who had outshone, in camp, their yeoman fellow-soldiers in homespun. W. Irving.

Macaronian (mak-a-ró'ni-an), n. Same as Macaronia.

Macaronic (mak-a-ró'nik), a. 1. Of or pertaining to the food macaroni. — 2. Pertaining to or like a macaroni; hence, empty, trifling; vain; affected. — 3. Consisting of a mixture or jumble of ill-formed or ill-connected words, or expressed in words of a barbarous or burlesque coinage, as of vulgar words Latinized or Latin words modernized; as, macaronic verse. — Macaronic verse or poetry, properly, a kind of humorous poetry in which, along with Latin, words of other languages are introduced with Latin inflections and construction. The name, however, is sometimes applied to verses which are merely a mixture of Latin and the unadulterated vernacular of the author. (The term was first employed to designate such verse by Teofilo Folengo, a Benedictine, who was born at Mantua 1484 and died 1544, and was selected with reference to the mixture of ingredients in the dish macaroni.)

Macaronic (mak-a-ró'nik), n. 1. A confused heap or mixture of several things. — 2. Macaronic verse.

Macaron (mak-a-rón), n. [Fr. macaron. See MACARONI.] 1. A small sweetcake, with almonds in it. — 2. A finical fellow or macaroni; a fop.

And no way fit to speak to cloved shoes. Dennis.
Macartney (mak-ár'tni), n. The name given to a species of pheasant (Euplocamus synotis), a native of China, from having been made known in this country by Lord Macartney during his mission to China. It is a native of Sumatra.

Macaroni and Lady in dress of 1770-1775.

Macassar-oil (ma-kas'ár-oll), n. An oil used for promoting the growth of the hair, so named from Macassar, a district in the island of Celebes, in the Eastern Archipelago, from which it was originally procured. The name is very commonly given to a perfumed mixture of castor-oil and olive-oil.

Macaw (ma-ká'), n. [The native name in the Antilles.] One of a genus (Macrocercus) of beautiful birds of the parrot tribe. black points. Mackerel gale, either a gale that ripples the surface of the sea, or one which is suitable for catching mackerel, as this fish is caught with the bait in motion. — Mackerel mint, spearmint (Mentha viridis). — Mackerel sky, a sky in which the clouds have the form called cirrocumulus, that is, are broken into fleecy masses. Called also a Mackerel-back Sky.

Mackereil (mak'ér-el), n. [O.Fr. maquerel, maquerel, a mackerel, and also a pander, there being a French popular belief that the mackerel follows the female shads, called vierges or maids, and brings them to the males. If the sense of pander or broker is the original sense, the word is probably derived, as Mahn thinks, from D. maker, make-laar, G. mäkler, a broker, an agent, O.H.G. mahhart, an agent, from mahhôn, to do, to transact.] A pander or pimp.

Mackereil-guide (mak'ér-el-gid), n. A name of the garfish (which see).

Mackereil-midge (mak'ér-el-mij), n. Motella or Couchia glauca, a minute fish common round the British coasts, and little more than 1 inch in length.

Mackintosh (mak'ér-in-tosh), n. A term applied, from the name of the inventor, to a garment, particularly an overcoat, rendered waterproof by a solution of india-rubber.

Mackie (mak'í), n. Same as Macule (which see).

Macie (mak'í), n. [Fr.; L. macula, a spot, the mesh of a net.] 1. In mineral. (a) A term applied to twin-crystals, which are united by simple contact of their faces by interpenetration, or by incorporation. These twin forms are often repeated so as to form groups or compound macies. (b) Chialotite, cross-stone, or hollow-spar, a variety of andalusite, the crystals of which have the axis and angles of different colours. (c) A tessellated appearance in other crystals. — 2. In her. same as Macule.

Maclurea (mak-lür-ä), n. [After William Maclure, a North American geologist.] A genus of fossil spiral, operculated shells, characteristic of the lower Silurian. They are of large dimensions.

Maclurite, Maclureite (mak-lür'it), n. [After William Maclure, a North American geologist.] A name common to two minerals: (a) a dark-green variety of pyroxene, a bialicite containing alumina, lime, iron, and magnesia. (b) A fluosilicate of iron and magnesia, also called Chondrodite, Bruicite, and Humite. Both minerals are found in metamorphic and igneous rocks.

Macmillanite (mak-mil'an-ít), n. One of a body, also known as the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland, after the Rev. John Macmillan, minister of Balmaghie, who, on his deposition from his charge in the Church of Scotland, became their first ordained clergyman. See CAMERONIAN.

Macouba (mak'ô-bä), n. Same as Maccouba.

Macrauchenia (mak-rä-ké'ni-ä), n. [Gr. makros, long, and auchen, the neck.] A genus of extinct perissodactyle mammals, occurring in the tertiary of South America, closely allied to the llamas, but of more gigantic dimensions. The dentition resembles that of the horse and rhinoceros; the skull is equine, but the neck bones are like those of the llamas and camels.

Macrobiotic (mak'ro-bi-ot'ik), a. [Gr. makros, long, and bios, life.] Long-lived.

Macrobiotids (mak'ro-bi-ot'id-é), n. pl. [Gr. makros, long, bios, life, and eidos, likeness.] A family of minute vermiform Aschelminths, without respiratory organs, known to microscopists as slith or bear, animacules, or water-bears. They are usually found in moss or in fresh water, and were formerly classed with the rotifers. Their form is usually an elongated oval, and they are furnished with four pairs of short legs, each of which usually bears four little claws. Little or nothing is known of their habits; and the most singular circumstance connected with them is their power of returning to life, like rotifers, when moistened, after having been for a considerable time in a dry and apparently lifeless state.

Macrocephalous (mak-ro-sel'al-us), a. [Gr. makros, large, and kephalê, the head.] 1. Having a large head. — 2. In bot. having the cotyledons of a dicotyledonous embryo confluent, and forming a large mass compared with the rest of the body.

Macrocerus (mak-ro-sér'kus), n. [Gr. makros, large, and kerkos, a tail.] A genus of birds belonging to the Pittacidæ or parrot family; the macaws. See MACAW.

Macrocosm (mak'ro-koz-m), n. [Gr. makros, great, and kosmos, world.] The great world; the universe, or the visible system of worlds: opposed to microcosm, or the little world constituted by man.

(Paracelsus seized hold of a notion which easily seduces the imagination of those who do not ask for rational proof, that there is a constant analogy between the macrocosm of external nature and the microcosm of man. Hallam.

Macrocyttis (mak-ro-sis'tis), n. [Gr. makros, long, and kyttis, a bag.] A genus of marine plants, belonging to the nat. order Algæ. The M. pyrifera exceeds all other vegetable productions in the length of its fronds, some of which have been estimated on reasonable grounds to attain a length of 700 feet. The leaves are long and narrow, and at the base of each is placed a vesicle filled with air for the purpose of enabling the plant to support its enormous length in the water, as its stem is not thicker than the finger, and its upper branches as slender as common packthread. It is found in the southern temperate zone, and along the Pacific as far north as the arctic regions.

Macroductyl (mak-ro-dak'til), n. An individual of the Macroductyll (which see).

Macroductyll (mak-ro-dak'til-l), n. pl. [Gr. makros, long, and daktylos, a finger.] A family of birds, of the order Grallatores, having very long toes; it comprises the coot, rail, water-hen, the jacana, &c.

Macroductylic, Macroductylous (mak'ro-dak'til'ik, mak-ro-dak'til-us), a. Having long toes: applied to a tribe of wading birds. See MACRODUCTYLL.

Macrodiagonal (mak'ro-di-ag'on-al), n. [Gr. makros, long, and E. diagonal.] The longer of the diagonals of a rhombic prism.

Macrodon (mak'ro-dôm), n. [Gr. makros, long, and domos, a house, dome.] In crystal, a dome parallel to the longer lateral axis in the trimetric system. Goodrich.

Macrology (mak-ro-lô-jî), n. [Gr. makros, great, and logos, discourse.] Long and tedious talk; prolonged discourse without matter; superfluity of words.

Macrometer (mak-rom-et-er), n. [Gr. makros, long, and metron, measure.] A mathematical instrument contrived to measure inaccessible heights and objects by means of two reflectors on a common sextant.

Macron (mä'kron), n. Same as Macrotone.

Macropetalous (mak-ro-pet'al-us), a. [Gr. makros, long, and petalon, a petal.] In bot. having large petals, as some species of Ranunculus.

Macrophyllous (mak-ro-fil'us or mak-rof'il-us), a. [Gr. makros, long, and phyllon, a leaf.] In bot. having large leaves.

Macropiper (mak-ro-pi-pér), n. [Gr. makros, long, and piper, pepper.] A genus of dicotyledonous shrubs of the nat. order Piperacæ, natives of the islands of the Pacific, now more usually regarded as a section of the genus Piper. One species, M. methysticum, furnishes a root called ava or kava, possessing narcotic and stimulant properties, a beverage prepared from which is the national drink of the Polynesians, and is always partaken of before entering upon any important business or religious rite. It is also drunk as a specific for rheumatism. The approved mode of manufacturing the beverage is to extract the juice by chewing, collecting the spittle for use.

Macropod (mak'ro-pôd), n. An individual of the family Macropodia.

Macropodal, Macropodous (mak-ro-pôd'al, mak-ro-pôd-us), a. [Gr. makros, large, and pous, foot.] 1. Large-footed. — 2. In bot. a term applied by Richard to the embryo of grasses, whose cotyledon was mistaken by him for an embryo.

Macropodia (mak-ro-pôd'i-ä), n. pl. [Gr. makros, and pous, a foot.] Latreille's name for a family of brachyurous decapod crustaceans (crabs), remarkable for the enormous length of their feet, which has obtained for them the name of sea-spiders. They generally remain at considerable depths in the sea, and are also found on oyster-banks.

Macropodian (mak-ro-pôd'i-an), a. Same as Macropod.

Macropodidæ, Macropodii (mak-ro-pôd'id-é, mak-ro-pôd'i-dé), n. pl. [See MACROPOD.] A family of non-placental mammals, of which the genus Macropus is the type. The family formerly comprised kangaroos, kangaroo-rats or potoroos, tree-kangaroos, phalangers, flying-squirrels, koalas, bandicoots, wombats, opossums, &c., animals widely varying in habit and form, some being vegetable-feeders and some carnivorous, but, with the exception of the opossums, all Australasian. Owen restricted the family to the kangaroos proper, and their close congeners belonging to the section Poephaga (grass-eaters) of the order Marsupialia, and his classification has generally been adopted. See KANGAROO.

Macropoma (mak'ro-pô-mä), n. [Gr. makros, long, and pôma, operculum.] A genus of fossil ganoids with homocerical tails, belonging to the cretaceous system: so named from the large operculum. Full-grown specimens are about 2 feet long.

Macropterous (mak-ro-p'tér-us), a. [Gr. makros, long, and pteron, a wing.] In zool. having long wings or fins.

Macropus (mak'ro-pus), n. [Gr. makros, long, and pous, a foot.] A genus of marsupial mammals, the type of the family Macropodidæ; the kangaroos. They have elongated hinder limbs with four toes, fore-feet with five toes, and a well-developed tail. See MACROPODIDÆ, KANGAROO.

Macroscelides (mak-ro-sel'id-é), n. [Gr. makros, long, and skelos, the thigh.] A genus of mammals belonging to the order Insectivora, containing several species, all South African, save one found on the coast of Barbary. M. proboscideus, the typical species, a native of the Cape, is about 1 foot in length, and its fur of the colour of that of the hare. It has a long nose, long hind-legs, and the habits of the jerboa. It feeds on insects.

Macrotherium (mak-ro-thér-i-um), n. [Gr. makros, long, and therion, a wild beast.] A fossil genus of gigantic mammals, the oldest representatives of the Edentata, found in the miocene tertiary of France, and intermediate between the pangolin or African ant-eater and the aardvark. It appears to have been destitute of dermal armour, and the teeth are rootless and without enamel.

Macroton (mak'ro-tôn), n. [Gr. makros, long, and tonos, line.] In gram. a horizontal line placed over vowels to show that they have their long or name sound; as, â in âme, ê in mê, î in îne, ô in ôme, û in tûbe.

Macrotous (mak-ro'tus), a. [Gr. makros, long, and ous, otos, the ear.] In zool. long-eared.

Macrotypous (mak-ro-ti'pus), a. [Gr. makros, long, and typos, form.] In mineral. having a long form.

Macroua (mak-ro'ua), n. See MACRURA.

Macroual, Macrourous (mak-ro'ou'al, mak-ro'ou-rus), a. See MACRURAL.

Macrouran (mak-ro'ou-ran), n. See MACRURAN.

Macrura (mak-rü'ra), n. pl. [Gr. makros, long, and oura, a tail.] A family of stalk-eyed decapod crustaceans, including the lobster, prawn, shrimp. They are so called in contrast to the Brachyura (crabs), in which the abdomen, usually called the apron, is rudimentary and turns forward, lying close below the cephalothorax, while in the Macrura the flexible abdomen is as fully developed as the cephalothorax, and extends straight backward, and is used in swimming.

Macrural, Macrurous (mak-rü'al, mak-rü-rus), a. Belonging to the family Macrura.

Macruran (mak-rü-ran), n. An individual of the family Macrura.

Macruration (mak-tä'shon), n. [L. mactatio, from macto, to kill.] The act of killing a victim for sacrifice.

Macrator (mak-tät'ér), n. A murderer.

Mactra (mak'tra), n. [L. a kneading-trough.] A genus of lamellibranchiate molluscs, the type of the family Mactridæ. They live in the sand, and are universally diffused. The genus includes many rare and beautiful species.

Mactridæ (mak'tri-dé), n. pl. A family of lamellibranchiate molluscs, having long respiratory siphons and a sinuated pallial line. The shell is equivalent, trigonal, hinge with two diverging cardinal teeth, mantle open in front, siphons united with fringed orifices, foot compressed. See MACTRA.

Macula (mak'ü-lä), n. pl. Maculæ (mak'ü-lé), [L.] A spot, as on the skin, or on the surface of the sun or other luminous orb.

Maculate (mak'ü-lät), v. t. [L. maculo, surface and full of little cavities, in each of which an individual polype was lodged; the radiating septa of the cavities corresponding to the internal divisions of the animal. Madreporites raise up walls and reefs of coral rocks with astonishing rapidity in tropical climates. The term is often applied to other branching corals than those of the genus Madrepore. See MADREPORARIA.

Madrepore (mad-rē-pōr-i-dē), n. pl. The madreporic family. See MADREPORÆ.

Madreporeiform (mad-rē-pōr-i-form), a. In zoöl. perforated with small holes like a coral; specifically, applied to the tubercle by which the ambulacral system of the echinoderms mostly communicate with the exterior.

Madreporeite (mad-rē-pōr-it), n. 1. A variety of limestone, so called on account of its occurring in radiated prismatic concretions resembling the stars of madreporites. When rubbed it emits the smell of sulphuretted hydrogen gas.—2. Fossil madreporite.

Madrier (mad-rēr or mad-rīr), n. [Fr.] In milit. engin. (a) a thick plank armed with iron plates, with a cavity to receive the mouth of a petard, with which it was applied to everything intended to be broken down. See PETARD. (b) A plank lined with tin and covered with earth to form roofs over certain portions of military works, in order to afford protection against fires in lodgements, &c. (c) A plank used for supporting the earth in a mine, or in a moat or ditch to support a wall.

Madrigal (mad-rī-gal), n. [Fr. Sp. and Pg. madrigal; It. madrigale, older It. madriale, mandriale, from ma and Gr. mandra, a sheepfold, or any place for sheep and shepherds to take shelter in; and thus madrigal was originally applied to the shepherd's song.] 1. A little amorous poem, consisting of not less than three or four stanzas of strophes, and containing some tender and delicate, though simple thought, suitably expressed. The strophes are generally connected together by rhymes, though this is not absolutely necessary, and indeed the term is used with a certain amount of looseness. The madrigal was first cultivated in Italy, and those of Tasso are among the finest specimens of Italian poetry. Several English poets of the time of Elizabeth and the Charleses wrote madrigals of notable grace and elegance, the chief names being Lodge, Withers, Carew, and Suckling. 2. An elaborate vocal composition now commonly of two or more movements, and in five or six parts. The musical madrigal was at first a simple song, but afterwards was suited to an instrumental accompaniment. There are a number of famous English composers of madrigals.

Madrigalist (mad-rī-gal-ist), n. A composer of madrigals. Dr. Burney.

Madriilian (mad-rī-lī-an), a. Of or belonging to Madrid.

Madriilian (mad-rī-lī-an), n. A native or inhabitant of Madrid.

Madriisa. See MEDRISA.

Madwort (mad-wört), n. The common name of several plants, chiefly of the genus Alysum, so called because they were formerly used as a remedy in canine madness.

Mae (mä), (A. Sax. mā, more, O.E. mœ, ma.) More. [Scotch.]

Magbote, Magbotes (mag-bōt), (A. Sax. mæcy, kinsman, and bote, compensation.) An ancient term signifying compensation for the slaughter of a kinsman.

Maelstrom (mä'l-ström), n. Lit. mill-stream: a celebrated whirlpool on the coast of Norway, near the island of Moakoa. It is very dangerous in winter, especially when the north-west wind restrains the reflux of the tide. At such times the whirlpool rages violently, so as to be heard several miles, and to engulf small vessels which approach it.

Menura, n. See MENURA.

Maer, Maor, n. [Gael. maor, maor, an under-bailiff.] Anciently in Scotland a steward of the royal lands under the mormaer or great steward. See MORMAER.

Maestoso (mä-es-tō-zō), ([It. majestic.] A direction in music to play with grandeur and strength.

Maestricht Beds (mä'strikt bedz), n. pl. The name given by geologists to the uppermost member of the cretaceous group of the Meuse valley, from Maestricht, a town of the Netherlands. These beds are marine, and composed of a soft yellowish-white limestone resembling chalk, and containing flint nodules, belemnites, hamites, hippurites, baculites, &c.

Maestro (ma-es-trō), n. [It.] A master of any art; specifically, a master in music; a composer.

Mafela, [O. Fr., my faith.] By my faith. Chaucer.

Maffet (maf'l), v. i. [Probably an imitative word. Comp. O.D. mafflen, mofflen, to move the jaws, to stammer. Prov. G. maffeln, bafeln, to prattle; E. faffle, to stammer.] To stammer. Holland.

Maffier (maf'lēr), n. A stammerer.

Magazine (mag-a-zēn), n. [Fr. magasin, a storehouse, Sp. magacen, almagacen, from Ar. al-makhzen, a storehouse, a warehouse, from khazana, to store.] 1. A receptacle in which anything is stored; a warehouse; a storehouse; specifically, (a) a strong building, constructed generally of brick or stone, for storing in security large quantities of gunpowder or other explosive substances, and warlike stores, either for industrial or military purposes, (b) The close room in the hold of a man-of-war where the gunpowder is kept. (c) The cartridge chamber of a magazine rifle (which see). (d) The fuel chamber of a magazine stove (see below). 'A magazine of all necessary provisions.' Raleigh.

2. A pamphlet periodically published, containing miscellaneous papers or compositions. The first publication of this kind in England was the Gentleman's Magazine, which was first published in 1731 by Edward Cave, under the name of Sylvanus Urban, and which is still continued, though its character is now entirely changed.—Magazine cartridge-box, a cartridge-box in which the cartridges are so arranged that they can easily be got at when wanted for loading.—Magazine rifle, a rifle containing a supply of cartridges, which are automatically fed to the chamber at the rear end of the barrel.—Magazine stove, a stove containing a fuel-chamber from which the fire is automatically fed with coal as that in the grate burns away.

Magazine (mag-a-zēn), v. t. To store up or accumulate for future use.

Magazine (mag-a-zēn), v. i. To conduct or edit a magazine.

Of magazing chiefs, whose rival page
With monthly medley courts the curious age.
Byron.

Magazine-day (mag-a-zēn-dā), n. The day on which monthly and other serial publications are published and supplied to the trade.

Magasiner, Magasinist (mag-a-zēn'ēr, mag-a-zēn'ist), n. One who writes in a magazine. 'If a magasiner be dull.' Goldsmith.

Magbote (mag-bōt). See MÆGBOTE.

Magdalen (mag-da-len), n. [From Mary Magdalene, who has been supposed to be the woman mentioned in St. Luke vii. 36-60.] A reformed prostitute; an inmate of a female penitentiary.—Magdalen hospital or Magdalen asylum, a house or establishment into which prostitutes are received with a view to their reformation; a female penitentiary.

Magdaleon (mag-dā-lō-on), n. [Gr. magdalia, the crumb or soft part of bread, from masō, to knead.] In med. (a) a medicine, as a pill, prepared with bread crumb. (b) A roll of plaster. Dunglison.

Magdeburg Hemispheres (mag'dē-bērg hem-l-sfērz), n. pl. [From having been first constructed by Otto Guericke of Magdeburg.] An apparatus for ascertaining the amount of the atmospheric pressure on a given surface. It consists of two hollow brass hemispheres, furnished with handles, and so formed that when placed mouth to mouth they shall be in air-tight contact. In this state the air is exhausted from the inside by means of the air-pump, when it will be found that the hemispheres adhere together with considerable force, owing to the pressure of the atmosphere on their external surfaces. If, then, the area of the section of the sphere through the centre be known, and the force required to pull the hemispheres asunder be ascertained, the pressure exerted by the atmosphere on a square inch of surface may be found, supposing the exhaustion of the hemispheres to be complete. The atmospheric pressure, however, is much more accurately ascertained by the barometer.

Mage (mā), n. [L. magus, from Gr. magos, a Magian, from Per. mag, a priest—probably from same root as L. magus, Gr. megas, great.] A magician. Spenser.

And there I saw mage Merlin, whose vast wit
And hundred winters are but as the hands
Of loyal vassals toiling for their liege. Tennyson.

Magellanic (mag-el-lan'ik), a. Pertaining to Magellan, the celebrated Portuguese navigator.—Magellanic clouds, three conspicuous whitish nebulæ, of a cloud-like appearance, near the south pole.

Magenta (ma-jen'ta), n. A brilliant blue-red colour derived from coal-tar. It was so named because it was discovered in 1859, the year of the battle of Magenta. Called also Fuchsine.

Magg (mag), v. t. [The most probable explanation of the word is that it is Gypsy slang, and allied to Hind. mafr, fraud, makkar, a cheat, a knave.] To steal; to carry off clandestinely. [Low slang.]

Magg (mag), n. 1. A cant word for a half-penny.—2. pl. The gratuity which servants expect from those to whom they drive any goods. [Scotch.]

Maggimonifect (mag-gi-mon'ī-fēt), n. [Maggy many feet.] A centipede. [Scotch.]

Maggiore (maj-jō'rā), a. [It.] In music, major, as a scale or interval.

Maggot (mag'ot), n. [Probably from W. maccat, pl. macciod, magiod, a maggot or grub, from magu, to breed.] 1. The larva of a fly or other insect; a grub; a worm.—2. A whim; an odd fancy; a crotchety. 'The maggot born in an empty head.' Tennyson.

Maggotiness (mag'ot-i-ness), n. The state of being maggoty or of abounding with maggots.

Maggotish (mag'ot-ish), a. Maggoty; whimsical.

Maggoty (mag'ot-i), a. 1. Full of or infested with maggots.—2. Capricious; whimsical. 'A maggoty unsettled head.' Norris.

Maggoty-headed (mag'ot-i-hed-ed), a. Having a head full of whims.

Magi (mā'jī), n. pl. [L. magus; Gr. magos, a Magian. See MAGE.] The caste of priests among the ancient Medes and Persians; hence holy men or sages of the East.

Magian (mā'jī-an), a. Pertaining to the Magi. 'The magian superstition of two independent Beings.' Dr. Watson.

Magian (mā'jī-an), n. One of the caste of the Persian Magi; one of the priests of the Zoroastrian religion. Their knowledge was deemed to be supernatural.

Magianism (mā'jī-an-izm), n. The philosophy or doctrines of the Magi.

Magic (mā'jīk), n. [L. magicus, pertaining to sorcery, from magia, Gr. magia, the theology of the Magians, magic. See MAGE.]

1. The art or pretended art or science of putting into action the power of spirits; or the science, art, or practice of producing wonderful effects by the aid of superhuman beings or of departed spirits, or the occult powers of nature; sorcery; enchantment; necromancy. 'If she in chains of magic were not bound.' Shak.—2. Power or influence similar to that of enchantment; as, the magic of love.—Natural magic, the art of applying natural causes to produce surprising effects.

The writers of natural magic attribute much to the virtues that come from the part of living creatures, as if they did infuse immaterial virtue into the part severed. Bacon.

—Celestial magic attributes to spirits a kind of dominion over the planets, and to the planets an influence over men.—Superstitious or goetic magic consists in the invocation of devils or demons, and supposes some tacit or express covenant or agreement between them and human beings.

And pluck my magic garment from me. Shak.

2. Using or having power to use magic. 'The magic propheta.' Waller.—3. Working or worked by or as if by magic.—[Magic differs from magical chiefly in the fact that it is not used predicatively. Thus we do not say the effect was magic. Moreover we do not speak of a magical lantern. See MAGICAL.]—Magic square, a square figure formed by a series of numbers in mathematical proportion, so disposed in parallel and equal ranks as that the sums of each row or line taken perpendicularly, horizontally, or diagonally are equal.—Magic lantern, a kind of lantern invented by Kircher, by means of which small images are represented on the wall of a dark room or on a white sheet, magnified to any size at pleasure. It consists of a closed lantern or box, in which are placed a lamp and a concave mirror (as at A), which reflects the light of the lamp through the small hole of a tube in the side of the lantern, which is made to draw out. At the end of this tube, next to the lamp, is fixed a plano-convex lens (B), and at the other a double-convex lens (D). Between the two lenses are successively placed (at C) various slips of glass, with transparent paintings, representing various subjects, which are thrown in a magnified form on the wall or screen opposite to the lantern and spectators.

Magic Lantern.

Magical (maj'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to magic; proceeding from magic; having supernatural qualities; as, magical powers or arts. 'The magical shield of your Aristotle.' Dryden.—2. Acting or produced as if by magic; as, the effect of the restorative was magical. 'His name, that magical word of war.' Shak.—3. Having the power of using magic; said of persons. Sir T. Herbert.—[For distinction between Magical and Magic see Magic, a.]

Magically (maj'ik-al-li), adv. In a magical manner; by the arts of magic. 'A ring magically prepared.' Camden.

Magician (maj-i'fahan), n. One skilled in magic; an enchanter; a necromancer. Shak.
Maglip, Maglip (ma-gilp', ma-gilp'), n. A gelatinous compound used by artists as a vehicle for colours. It is produced by mixing linseed-oil and mastic varnish together. Written also Meglip, Meglip.

Magilus (maj'il-us), n. A genus of gastropodous mollusca, containing only one species (M. antiquus), which lives in masses of coral. The shell is at first an ordinary spiral, but as the coral grows it is prolonged into a tube directed outward to the surface of the coral, so that the animal may always be in contact with the surface of the water. The tube may be 3 feet long, the lower part being filled with calcareous matter.

Magister (ma-jis'tér), n. [L., from mag, root of magnus, great, as minister from min, root of minor, less.] Master; sir; an appellation given in the middle ages to persons of scientific or literary distinction, equivalent to the modern title of Doctor.

Magisterial (maj-is-tér-i-al), a. [See MAGISTRATE.] 1. Pertaining to a master; such as suits a master; authoritative; proud; lofty; arrogant; imperious; domineering.

Pretenes go a great way with men that take fair words and magisterial looks for current payment. Sir R. L. Estrange.

2. Of or belonging to a magistrate or his office; of the rank of a magistrate.

The third estate consisted of 578, and of these only 32 were clerical, noble, or magisterial. Brougham.

3. In chem. pertaining to magistracy (which see).—Magisterial, Dogmatic, Arrogant. Magisterial applies to the manner of saying or doing a thing—assuming the tone and gesture of a superior or master. Dogmatic characterizes the temper and manner of saying something; we are not dogmatic from any exaggerated idea of our own importance, but because we have implicit faith in the truth of what we say, and imagine that others should naturally be in the same way of thinking. Arrogant implies the assumption of more than due authority from an over-estimate of one's importance.

He uses a magisterial authority while he instructs him. South.
A dogmatic spirit inclines a man to be censorious of his neighbours. Watts.

An arrogant way of treating with other princes and states is natural to popular governments. Sir W. Temple.

SYN. Authoritative, lofty, imperious, proud, haughty, domineering, despotic, arrogant.

Magisterially (maj-is-tér-i-al-li), adv. In a magisterial manner: (a) with the air of a master; arrogantly; authoritatively. (b) In the capacity of a magistrate.

Magisterialness (maj-is-tér-i-al-ness), n. The state or quality of being magisterial; the air and manner of a master; haughtiness; imperiousness; peremptoriness.

Magistry (maj'is-tér-i), n. [L. magisterium, the office of a master or guide.] 1. A magisterial injunction; a command which can be enforced. [Rare.]

This last was not a magistry, but a mere command. Brougham.

2. In chem. a term formerly given to various extracts or preparations, especially to certain precipitates, as that seen when water is added to a solution of bismuth in nitric acid.

3. Any kind of medicine or remedial agency claiming to be of exceptional efficacy; a magistral.

Magistracy (maj'is-tre-si), n. [See MAGISTRATE.] 1. The office or dignity of a magistrate.—2. The body of magistrates.

That enlightened, eloquent, sage, and profound body, the Magistracy of London. Dickens.

Magistral (maj'is-tral), a. 1. Suiting a magistrate; magisterial; authoritative.—2. Pertaining to a sovereign medicine or remedy. 'Some magistral opiate.' Bacon.—Magistral line. See MAGISTRAL, n. 2.

Magistral (maj'is-tral), n. 1. A sovereign medicine or remedy.—2. In fort. the line where the scarp of a permanent fortification, if prolonged, would intersect the top of the coping or cordon. It is the master line, which regulates the form of the work. Called also Magistral Line.—3. The roasted and pulverized copper of pyrites added to the ground ores of silver for the purpose of decomposing the horn-silver present.

Magistrality (maj-is-tral'i-ti), n. Despotical authority, as in the matter of opinion. 'Those who seek truths, and not magistrality.' Bacon.

Magistrally (maj'is-tral-li), adv. Authoritatively; magisterially. Bramhall.

Magistrand (maj-is-trand'), n. [L. magistrandus, from magister, signifying in medieval Latin to make a master (as in arts) of, to confer a university degree upon, from magister, a master.] A designation given in the University of Aberdeen to a student in arts in the last year of his curriculum.

Magistrate (maj'is-trát), n. [L. magistratus, a magistrate, from magister, a master. See MAGISTER.] A public civil officer invested with the executive government or some branch of it. In this sense a king is the highest or first magistrate in a monarchy, as is the president in a republic. But the word is more particularly applied to subordinate officers, to whom the executive power of the law is committed, either wholly or in part, as governors, intendants, prefects, mayors, justices of the peace, and the like. In England the term is usually restricted to justices of peace in the country, and to police and stipendiary magistrates in London and the larger towns; and in Scotland to the provost and bailies in burghs.

The obvious definition of a monarchy seems to be that of a state, in which a single person, by whatever name he may be distinguished, is intrusted with the execution of the laws, the management of the revenue, and the command of the army. But, unless public liberty is protected by intrepid and vigilant guardians, the authority of so formidable a magistrate will soon degenerate into despotism. Gibbon.

Magistratic (maj-is-trat'ik), a. Of or pertaining to a magistrate; having the authority of a magistrate. 'Magistratic or ecclesiastic power and order.' Jer. Taylor.

Magistratical (maj-is-trat'ik-al), a. Same as Magistratic. Godwin. [Rare.]

Magistrature (maj'is-trát-ür), n. Magistracy. [Rare.]

Magma (mag'ma), n. [Gr., a mass, salve, dregs, from root mag, to knead.] 1. The generic name of any crude mixture of mineral or organic matters in a thin pasty state. 2. In med. (a) the thick residuum obtained after expressing certain substances to extract the fluid parts from them. (b) The grounds which remain after treating a substance with water, alcohol, or any other menstruum. (c) A salve of a certain degree of consistence.—3. A confection.

Magna Charta (mag'ná kár'ta), n. [L., great charter.] 1. The great charter of the liberties (Magna Charta Libertatum) of England, signed and sealed by King John in a conference between him and his barons at Runnymede, June 19, 1215. Its most important articles are those which provide that no freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or proceeded against except by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land, and that no scutage or aid should be imposed in the kingdom (except certain feudal dues from tenants of the crown), unless by the common council of the kingdom. The remaining and greater part of the charter is directed against abuses of the king's power as feudal superior. The charter granted by Henry III. is only a confirmation of that of his father King John. Hence—2. A fundamental constitution which guarantees rights and privileges.

Magnality (mag-na'l'i-ti), n. Something great; a great or striking deed or feat. Sir T. Browne.

Magnanimity (mag-na-nim'i-ti), n. [L. magnanimitas. See MAGNANIMOUS.] The quality of being magnanimous; greatness of mind; elevation or dignity of soul, which encounters danger and trouble with tranquillity and firmness, which raises the possessor above revenge, and makes him delight in acts of benevolence, disdain injustice and meanness, and prompts him to sacrifice personal ease, interest, and safety for the accomplishment of useful and noble objects.

Sir Thomas Eliot (1535) speaks of the now familiar words 'frugality,' 'temperance,' 'sobriety,' and 'magnanimity,' as being not in his day in general use; magnanimity, however, is in Chaucer.

Magnanimous (mag-nan'im-us), a. [L. magnanimus—magnus, great, and animus, mind.] 1. Great of mind; elevated in soul or in sentiment; raised above what is low, mean, or ungenerous; brave; dauntless; heroic; as, a magnanimous prince or general.—2. Dictated by magnanimity; exhibiting nobleness of soul; liberal and honourable; not selfish.

There is an indissoluble union between a magnanimous policy and the solid rewards of public prosperity and felicity. Washington.

Magnanimously (mag-nan'im-us-li), adv. In a magnanimous manner; with greatness of mind; bravely; with dignity and elevation of sentiment.

A complete and generous education fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously, all the offices of peace and war. Milton.

Magnase (mag'nás), a. A term applied to an excellent black colour, which dries rapidly.

Magnase black is the best of all blacks for drying in oil without addition, or preparation of the oil: it is a colour of vast body and tingeing power. Wate.

Magnate (mag'nát), n. [L. magnates (pl.) from magnus, great.] 1. A person of rank; a noble or grandee; a person of note or distinction in any sphere; as, a literary magnate.

More than one of the magnates who bore that wide-spread name. Macanlay.

Specifically—2. One of the nobility or persons of rank forming the House of Magnates in the national representation of Hungary.

Magnes, Magnes-stone (mag'nér, mag'néz-étón), n. [L., from Gr. magnés.] A magnet.

On another syde an hideous rocke is pight Of mightie magnes-stone. Spenser.

Magnesia (mag-né'shi-a), n. [From Magnesia in Asia Minor, whence also magnet, L. magnés. Pliny describes a white kind of magnes which did not attract iron, and which is conjectured to have been carbonate of magnesia.] Oxide of magnesium. It is a white tasteless earthy substance, possessing alkaline properties, and having a sp. gr. of 2.3. It is absorbent, antacid, and mildly cathartic. It is almost insoluble. It is found native in the state of hydrate and carbonate, and exists as a component part of several minerals. In com. pure magnesia is generally distinguished by the term calcined magnesia, and is readily obtained by exposing its hydrated carbonate to a red heat. The hydrated carbonate goes by the name of magnesia, or magnesia alba. The chief use of magnesia and its carbonate is in medicine. Sulphate of magnesia is known by the name of Epsom-salt, having been first obtained from a spring at Epsom. It is a useful purgative medicine, and is also employed in the preparation of magnesia and its carbonate.

Magnesian (mag-né'shi-an), a. Pertaining to or partaking of the qualities of magnesia; containing or resembling magnesia.—Magnesian limestone, (a) properly, a rock composed of carbonates of lime and magnesia, the latter amounting in some cases to nearly a half. There are several varieties, more or less useful for building or ornamental purposes, which are included under the generic term dolomite (which see). (b) A name frequently given to the whole Permian for-

P. Sidney. — 2.1. Multifaceted, generous; open-handed.

Every generous person becomes liberal and magnanimous, although he had been otherwise a yielding individual.

Magnificently (mag-nif-ic-ent-ly), adv. In a magnificent manner, with magnificence; with splendour of appearance or pomp of show.

Magnifico (mag-nif-ic-o), n. 1. A grandee of Venice.

But if the pious have ceased to be magnificient, may it not also happen that the heretics may come to be so? Dugès

2. A rector of a German university.

Magnifier (mag-nif-ic-er), n. One who or that which magnifies (a) that which enlarges or increases apparent size, specifically, an optical instrument that magnifies, a convex lens, a concave mirror, or a combination of lenses or mirrors, which increases the apparent magnitude of bodies. (b) One who extols or exalts.

Magnify (mag-nif-ic-er), v. t. pret. & pp. magnified, pp. magnifying. [L. magnifico — magnus, great, and facio, to make.] 1. To make great or greater; to increase the apparent dimensions of; to enlarge; to augment; as, a convex lens magnifies the bulk of a body to the eye. — 2. To increase the power or glory of; to sound the praises of; to extol; to exalt.

O, magnify the Lord with me, and let us exult his name together. Ps. xcvi. 3.

That day
They themselves magnified. Milton.

2. To represent as greater than reality, to exaggerate. — SYN. To enlarge, amplify, augment, exaggerate, exalt, extol, praise, glorify. Magnify (mag-nif-ic-er), v. i. 1. To possess the quality of causing objects to appear larger than reality, to increase the apparent dimensions of objects, as, my spectacles magnify too much. — 2. To have effect; to avail; to signify. [Old vulgarism.]

My governors seemed my father I had wanted the nothing, that I was almost come up with the great-sickness but this magnified but little with my father. Spenser.

— Magnifying glass, in optics, a plano-convex or double-convex lens: so called because objects seen through it have their apparent dimensions increased.

Magniloquence (mag-nil-o-kuw-ens), n. [L. magniloquens — magnus, great, and loquens, speaking.] A lofty manner of speaking or writing, tumid, pompous words or style, language expressive of pretensions greater than realities warrant, grandiloquence, bombast.

Magniloquent (mag-nil-o-kuw-ent), n. Big in words, speaking loftily or pompously; expressing lofty pretensions; bombastic; tumid, grandiloquent.

Magniloquently (mag-nil-o-kuw-ent-ly), adv. In a magniloquent manner; with loftiness or pompousness of language.

Magniloquous (mag-nil-o-kuw-ens), n. Magniloquent.

Magnitude (mag-nit-ud), n. [L. magnitudo, from magnus, great.] 1. The comparative greatness of anything that can be said to be greater or smaller, the comparative extent, bulk, size, quantity, or amount of anything that can be measured, as, the magnitude of an object, of a surface, of a line, of an angle, of a weight or force of any kind, of an interval of time. — 2. Anything that can be measured; any quantity that can be expressed in terms of a quantity of the same kind taken as a unit; specifically, in geometry, that which has one or more of the three dimensions, length, breadth, and thickness. An angle is also a kind of geometrical magnitude. Time, weight, and numbers are arithmetical magnitudes. — 3. Greatness, as referred to an intellectual or moral standard; grandeur.

With plain heroic magnitudes of mind. Milton.

4. Importance; consequence; as, in affairs of magnitude details do not take counsel. — Apparent magnitude of an object, that which is measured by the optic or visual angle intercepted between lines drawn from its extremities to the centre of the pupil of the eye. This angle may be considered to be inversely as the distance of the object. (This term is chiefly used when speaking of the heavenly bodies, but is also used in many branches of optical science.) — Magnitude of stars. See STAR.

Magnolia (mag-nol-ya), n. [After Pierre Magnol, professor of botany at Montpellier in the seventeenth century.] A genus of trees and shrubs, the type of the nat. order Magnoliaceae. The species, which chiefly inhabit North America, Northern India, China, Japan, and other parts of Asia, are trees much admired on account of the elegance of their flowers and foliage, and are in great request in gardens. The bark of the root of M. planis, or the beaver-tree, is an important tonic. (See BEAVER-TREE.) M. tripetala, or umbrella-tree, has also tonic properties. The cones of M. acuminata yield a spirituous liquor, employed in Virginia in rheumatic affections. M. grandiflora, or big laurel, and M. speciosa or Yulan, the yulan or Chinese magnolia, grow well in the south of England, and are perhaps the finest of our ornamental trees. The yulan is remarkable in that it flowers in spring before the leaves expand.

Magnoliaceae (mag-nol-ya-se-ae), n. pl. An important nat. order of albuminous polyteloneous exogens, allied to the Ranunculaceae, consisting of bushes and trees, inhabiting the temperate parts of both the Old and New World. They have alternate minutely dotted leaves, and large solitary flowers; the bark is aromatic and bitter. Several species are valuable for their timber, others for the febrifugal qualities of their bark. (See MAGNOLIA.) Most of them are prized for the beauty of their flowers and foliage. The bark of the tulip-tree (Liriodendron tulipifera) is said to equal Peruvian bark. Drumys Winteri yields winter's bark. Rhus glabra is called star-bark from its flavour and the starlike arrangement of its coriols. See STAR-ANISE.

Magnum (mag-nam), n. [L., large.] A bottle holding two English quarts.

The appreciation of much more rational temper than the S. club could have monitored over before the discussion of the first evening. Sir W. Scott.

Magnum-bonum (mag-nam-bon-um), n. [L., lit. large-good.] 1. The name applied to a large-sized oval plum having a yellow skin covered with a thin whitish bloom. — 2. A kind of large-sized barrel pen.

Magot (mag-ot), n. [Fr.] The Barbary ape (Macacus sylvester or Macacus caudatus), which has a small tubercle in place of a tail. It is naturalized on the rock of Gibraltar, and forms the type of Cuvier's genus Insula. It is remarkable for docility and attachment to its young.

Magot-pie, || Magot-pie (mag-ot-pi), n. [Magot, maggot, a form of Mariposa, and pie, like Fr. marteau, a pie, a dim. form of Mariposa.] A magpie.

A magot, and undressed relations have
By magot-pie, and choughs, and cocks, brought forth
The secret men of blood. Shak.

Magpie (mag-pi), n. [Mag, for Mariposa, and pie, a magpie, from L. pica, a pie or magpie. Called also magot-pie, maggoty-pie, maggot-pie. Comp. O. E. Magpa, houlet, an owl; Jenny-wren, Robin-redbreast, &c. See MASOT-FIL.] 1. A well-known bird, the Magpie (Pica pica).

Pica pica, type of the genus Pica, belonging to the Corvidae or crow family. It is about 13 inches in length; the plumage is black and white, the black glossed with green and purple; the bill is stout, and the tail is very long, whence its specific name caudata. The magpies continue in pairs throughout the year, and prey on a variety of food, chiefly animal. They are celebrated for their crafty instincts, their power of imitating words, and their propensity to purloin and secretly glittering articles. — 2. A halfpenny. [Slang.]

I'm of low water-march—only one boot and a magpie. Dehob.

2. In volunteers' slang, a shot striking the target in the division next the outermost in a target divided into four sections: so called because the markers indicate this hit by means of a black and white disk.

Magpie-moth (mag-pi-moth), n. Larva proserpinx (Linn.) a moth belonging to the family Geometridae, and often called the Geometrid-moth. Its colour is white with black and orange spots, and the same colours appear on it in its larval and pupal states. The larva feeds on currant and gooseberry leaves, and where abundant is very destructive.

Magman (mag-man), n. A street swindler who preys on countrymen and others easily duped. [Slang.]

Maguary (ma-gwa' or mag-wa'), n. [Mexican maguari.] A species of Agave (A. americana), American also, belonging to the nat. order Amariyllidaceae. It is a native of Mexico, and furnished the natives with a material for their buildings. Its leaves were used for covering the roofs of their houses, and for paper, clothing, and cordage; also for preparing a spirituous liquor called pulque. See AGAVE.

Magus (ma'gus), n. [L. See MAGE.] A Magician, one of the Magi or ancient oriental philosophers.

Magyar (mag-yar; Hung. pron. mod-yor'), n. 1. One of an Asiatic race which invaded Hungary about the end of the ninth century, and settled there, where it still forms the predominant race. — 2. The native tongue of Hungary. It belongs to the Ugric family of the Turanian or agglutinative class of tongues.

Magyars (ma'j-dar), n. [L. magyarus or magyaricus, Gr. magyaria.] Lesser word, a plant of the genus Lesperidium.

Mahabharata (ma-ha-bha're-ta), n. [Sk. mahat, great, and Bharata, the descendants of a king named Bharata. Lit. the great history of the descendants of Bharata.] The name of one of the two great epic poems of ancient India, the other being the Ramayana. It is founded on, and contains a history of, the contest for supremacy between the two great royal families of North India—the Pandavas and Kurus or Kauravas—ending in the victory of the former, and in the establishment of their rule over the northern part of India. In reality, however, this narrative occupies but a fourth of the poem, the other three-fourths being epical and added at various times. The Mahabharata thus became a sort of encyclopaedia, embracing everything which it concerned a cultivated Hindu to know.

Mahadeva (ma-ha-de'va), n. [Sk. mahat, great, and deva, god; lit. the great god.] A name of Shiva, one of the Indian deities, from which the sacred Ganges is fabled to have sprung.

Mahaleb (ma-ha'leb), n. [Ar. mahaleb.] A species of cherry (Cerasus Mahaleb), nat. order Rosaceae, sub-order Drupaceae, whose fruit affords a violet dye and a fermented liquor like kirch-wasser. It is found in the middle and south of Europe. Its flowers and leaves are used by perfumers, and its wood by cabinet-makers.

Maharajah (ma-ha-ra'ja or ma-ha-ra-ja), n. [Sk. from mahat, great, and raja, a prince or king.] The title assumed by some Indian princes ruling over a considerable extent of territory.

Maharam (ma-har'ma), n. A muslin wrapper worn over the head and across the mouth and chin by Turkish and Armenian ladies when they appear abroad. Sinimonda.

Mahoe (ma-ho'), n. [Hind.] The native name of the gall-out of the tamarisk tree, imported into England from India for dyeing and photographic purposes, from its richness in gallic acid. Called in Algeria, whence it is exported to France, maehout.

Mahl-stick (ma'hil), n. Same as Mahlestick.

Mahogany (ma-hog-an-ty), n. To paint wood in imitation of mahogany, or to put a veneering of mahogany over. [American.]

Mahogany (ma-hog-an-ty), n. [Mahogany, native American name.] 1. A tree of the genus Swietenia, the S. Mahogany, belonging to the nat. order Cedrelaceae. It grows in the West Indies and Central America. Two other species of Swietenia are found in the East Indies, but they are not much known in this country. The mahogany is one of the most majestic and beautiful of trees, its trunk is often 60 feet in length and 6 feet in diameter.

The plant is a small, bushy, perennial, with many small, white, tubular flowers, which are very fragrant. It is a native of the East Indies, and is now cultivated in many parts of the world.

Maistris, n. Mastery, skill; skilful management; power; superiority—A maistris, a mastery operation. [Chaucer. In Chaucer's Prologue we find the line, 'A monk there was a fair for the maistris,' a fair for the maistris seems to mean a fair one, that is, one who might fairly claim the mastery or superiority among others.

Maistris (māstris), n. Mastering; superior, controlling.

And her white palfrey, having conquered The maistris reins out of her weary wrist, Perfected has carried where ever he thought best. [Spenser.]

Maistris, n. Mastery; workmanship.

Main (mān), n. [Sp. maiz, from Haytian maiz, the native name of the plant.] Indian corn, a genus of plants commonly cultivated in the warmer parts of the world, where it answers a purpose similar to that of wheat in more northern countries. The common maize or Indian corn is the Zea

Mays of botanists, a monocotyledonous grain, of vigorous growth, with stems not more than 2 feet high in some varieties, and reaching the height of 8 or even 10 feet in others. The grains are large, compressed, and packed closely in regular parallel rows along the sides of a receptacle many inches long. In large varieties the ear or cob is often 1 foot long and 2 or 3 inches in thickness. Maize is extensively cultivated in America, where it forms almost the only bread eaten by many of the people. Its flour, though exceedingly nourishing, is not glutinous, and must accordingly be mixed with wheat, rye, or other flour before it can be baked. In America large quantities of unripe grains are roasted till they split, and are then eaten under the name of popcorn. From the green stems a syrup is expressed, which is fermented and converted into a kind of spirits. Paper has been made from maize fibres. It is also cultivated throughout a great part of Asia and Africa, and in several countries of the south of Europe, as Spain and Italy. The green stems and leaves form nutritious food for cattle, and in this country it is sown and cut green for this purpose. 2. Cyperus, a smaller species, is the Chili maize or Valparaiso corn.

Main (See May).

Majolica (ma-jol'i-ka), n. [From Majolica or Majorian, for Majolica, whence the first specimens came.] A name given to a kind of earth used for making dishes, vases, &c.; afterwards applied to the ware itself, which resembles porcelain.

Major (ma-jor), a. [L. magister of magnum, great. See MAJORITY, MAJORITY.] 1. Greater in number, quantity, or extent; as, the major part of the assembly, the major part of the revenue; the major part of the territory.—2. Greater in dignity; more important.

My major son has here. Shak.

3. In music, an epithet applied to the modes in which the third is four semitones above the tonic or key note, and to intervals consisting of four semitones, thus C, G, D, G, E. The major mode takes a major or sharp third, and is thus distinguished from that having a minor or flat one. The major mode has always a greater third, that is, a third consisting of two tones, and the minor mode has always a minor third, that is, a third consisting of a tone and a semitone. See MODE.—Major and minor are applied to imperfect concords, which differ from each other by a semitone minor. They are used in the same sense when applied to discords.—Major tone or interval, an interval represented by the ratio of 8 to 9, while a minor tone is represented by the ratio of 9 to 10. Thus in the natural scale, the interval G to A is a major tone, while the interval D to E is a minor tone. The major tone surpasses the minor by a comma.—Major term of a syllogism, in logic, the predicate of the conclusion; the major premiss is that which contains the major term. See under MAJOR, n.

Major (ma-jor), n. 1. Militar an officer next in rank above a captain and below a lieutenant-colonel, the lowest field-officer. His chief duties consist in superintending the exercises of his regiment or battalion, and in putting in execution the commands of his superior officer.—2. In law, a person of full age to manage his own concerns, which both in male and female is the age of twenty-one years complete.—3. In logic, the first proposition of a regular syllogism, containing the major term. See SYLLOGISM.—Major and minor in a libel, in Scots law, the major proposition in a criminal libel names the crime to be charged, or, if it have no proper name, describes it at large, and as a crime severely punishable. The minor proposition avers the peccator's guilt of this crime, and supports the averment by a narrative of the fact alleged to have been committed, it being necessary that the minor agree with the major. And the conclusion infers that on conviction he ought to be punished with the pains of law applicable to his offence.—At-law major, brigade-major, drum-major, fy's-major, sergeant-major. See under these terms.

Major (ma-jor), v. To look and talk big, or with a military air. See W. Scott.

It is most easily obtained from the fruit of Pyrus Aucuparia (mountain-ash or rowan-tree), immediately after it has turned red, but while still unripe. It is very soluble in water, and has a pleasant acid taste.

Malice (mal'is), n. [Fr. malice, L. malitia, from malus, evil; cog. Gr. malos, black; Skr. malá, filth; Ir. malis, evil; Corn. malan, the devil.] 1. Enmity of heart; a disposition to injure others without cause, from mere personal gratification, or from a spirit of revenge; unprovoked malignity or spite; ill-will.

Speak of me as I am; nothing extenuate,
Nor set down aught in malice. Shak.

2. In law, a formed design or intention of doing mischief to another, called also malice prepense or aforsought. It is expressed when the formed design is evidenced by certain circumstances, discovering such intention; and implied when the act is done in such a deliberate manner that the law presumes malice, though no particular enmity can be proved.—3. A malicious person.

Hag-seed, hence!

Fetch us in fuel; and be quick, thou'rt best,
To answer our business. Shrugst thou, malice! Shak.

SYN. Ill-will, malevolence, enmity, hate, spite, bitterness, malignity, maliciousness, rancour.—Malice, Malevolence, Malignity. Malice is a deeper and more abiding feeling than malevolence, more characteristic of the disposition of a person, and more likely to make itself seen in action. Malevolence is of a more casual and temporary character, and may often be excited by real or fancied wrongs; it is rather characterized by the desire that evil should happen to another than with an intention to bring it about. Malignity is the spirit of malice intensified, a disposition to bring about evil and mischief from an innate love of doing harm to others.

Malice† (mal'is), v.t. To regard with extreme ill-will; to bear extreme ill-will to.

Offending none, and doing good to all,

Yet being malic'd both of great and small. Spenser.

Malicious (ma-lí'shus), a. [L. malitiosus, from malitia, wickedness. See MALICE.] 1. Indulging or exercising malice; harbouring ill-will or enmity without provocation; malevolent in the extreme; malignant in heart.

I grant him bloody,

Luxurious, avaricious, false, deceitful,
Sudden, malicious, smacking of every sin
That has a name. Shak.

2. Proceeding from extreme hatred or ill-will; dictated by malice; as, a malicious report.—Malicious abandonment, in law, the desertion of a spouse without just cause.—Malicious mischief, in law, the committing of an injury to public or private property, not for the purposes of theft, but from sheer wantonness or malice. This offence is punishable with great severity. In some instances it is a felony, in others a misdemeanour; punishable in some on summary conviction. Intent is the material ingredient in offences of this nature, but as the law presumes malice in the very commission of the act, it lies on the party indicted to rebut the presumption of malice or sufficiently explain the act.—Malicious prosecution, a prosecution preferred maliciously without reasonable cause. From want of probable cause malice may be inferred.—SYN. Ill-disposed, evil-minded, mischievous, malevolent, spiteful, resentful, bitter, malignant, rancorous.

Maliciously (ma-lí'shus-lí), adv. In a malicious manner; with malice, enmity, or ill-will.

Malurus (ma-Mû-rus), n. (Gr. malos, evil, and oura, a tail.) A genus of insectivorous birds belonging to the family Sylviidae, abundantly dispersed through New South Wales. M. spinus is named by the colonists the Superb Warbler Blue Wren, &c. It is a very beautiful bird.

Mallow (mal-ô), n. [See MALLOW.] A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Malvaceæ, of which it is the type. The mallows. There are about sixteen species, natives of Europe, temperate Asia, and North Africa, some of them widely spread woods of cultivation. They are hairy or smooth herbs, with lobed angular or dissected leaves, and axillary solitary or fasciated flowers; the petals are notched, purplish rose coloured or white.

M. sylvestris (the common mallow) is a common and widely diffused species, possessed of mucilaginous properties. The whole plant is used officinally in Britain in fomentations, cataplasms, and emollient resmas. When fresh the flowers are reddish purple, but on drying become blue, and yield their coloring principle both to water and alcohol. The alcoholic tincture furnishes one of the most delicate of reagents for testing the presence of alkalies or acids.

Mallow (mal-ô), a. pl. A large natural order of vaguous plants, the distinguishing marks of which are, polypetalous flowers, monadelphous stamens, umbelular anthers, valvate calivation, and often an external only (epicalyx) or involucre. A large portion of the order consists of herbaceous or annual plants, inhabiting all the milder parts of the world, but found most plentifully in hot countries. Several species are of essential service to man. As emollients they are well known in medical practice. The hairy covering of the seeds of the various species of Cosmosiphon forms raw cotton. The inner bark of many species yields fibre of considerable value. Many species of Althæa, Rosa, and Hibiscus are splendid flowering plants. See MALVA.

Mameluke, Mameluka (mam-ô-lûk, mam-ô-lûk), n. [Ar. mamlûk, that which is possessed, a slave, from malak, to possess.] One of the former mounted soldiery of Egypt, consisting originally of Circassian slaves of the boys, introduced in the thirteenth century. So early as 1254 they became so powerful that they made one of their own number sultan, their dynasty continuing till 1517 when it was overthrown by Selim I. Their power however remained so great that they continued to be virtual masters of the country. In 1811 the new pasha (afterwards viceroys) of Egypt, Mehemet Ali, having invited the chief Mamelukes, pretending to grace his investiture, into the citadel of Cairo, caused them to be butchered, to the number of 470, which was followed by a general massacre of them throughout Egypt. Some hundreds who escaped into Lower Nubia, built a town, and endeavoured to keep up their force by disciplining negroes. In this they did not succeed, and shortly afterwards disappeared. Written also Mamluk, Mamlûk.

Mammon (mam-môn), n. (Fr., a stipple, from L. mammon, a breast.) A small hill or mound with a round top, so called from its resemblance to a woman's breast, a hemispherical elevation. Our tents were pitched on another mammon. W. H. Murray.

Mamma (mam-mâ), a. pl. Mammæ (mam-mâ), [L. See MAMA.] The breast, the organ in females that secretes the milk.

man, man, mand; supposed to be from a root man, meaning to think, seen unchanged in Skir man, to think, to know, in manas, mind, manushya, a man, and also in E. man, to intend, mind, G. manas, love, L. mens, the mind, memorari, to remember, &c. In English there is only one word for man and human being (L. vir and homo), but other Teutonic languages have two, as D. man and mensch, G. mann and mensch, Dan. mand and meneske, the latter being properly adjectives. The pl. men is parallel to feet, the change of a and o to e being the result of umlaut (manni giving men, föti, fet, feet). 1. An individual of the human race; a human being; a person; as, no man is infallible.

A man in an instant may discover the assertion to be impossible. Dr. H. More.

2. Particularly, a male adult of the human race, as distinguished from a woman or a boy.

Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man. 1 Cor. xi. 9.

The nurse's legends are for truths received. And the man dreams but what the boy believed. Dryden.

3. The human race; mankind; the totality of human beings: used without article or plural; as, man is born to trouble. Blumenbach divides mankind into five varieties:—(1) Caucasian variety, having the skin white. (2) The Mongolian variety, of an olive colour. (3) The Ethiopian variety, the skin and eyes black. (4) The American variety, the skin dark, and more or less of a red tint. (5) The Malay variety, the colour varying from a light tawny to a deep brown. Professor Huxley has divided man into five groups: Australoid, Negroid, Mongoloid, and the Xanthochroic and Melanochroic (fair and dark whites). The Australoid group includes the indigenous non-Aryan tribes of Central and Southern India, the ancient Egyptians and their descendants the modern Fellahs. In the Negroid, he includes both the Negroes proper and the Bushmen of the extreme south, the Hottentots being considered a cross-breed between these. The Mongoloid includes the Tatar races, the Chinese and Japanese. The nations described as 'Caucasian' he breaks up into two groups—the Xanthochroic, or fair whites, of which the Teutonic and Scandinavian races may be regarded as the type; and the Melanochroic, or dark whites, which he is disposed to consider as sprung from intermixture of Xanthochroic and Australoids. The Hindus, Arabs, and the dark-haired inhabitants of Southern Europe belong to this division. In the above classification many races, as the American Indians, natives of Australia, New Zealand, &c., appear to be left out of account.—4. A male who possesses in a remarkable degree the characteristics of manhood, as manly strength or virtue.

I dare do all that may become a man; Who dares do more is none. Shak.

5. A male servant or attendant; an adult male in some person's employment or under his direction; a workman; an employee. 'Like master, like man.' Old proverb.

I and my man will presently go ride. Cheney.

6. A vassal, liege, subject, or tenant: with possessives.

The vassal or tenant, kneeling, ungirt, uncovered, and holding up his hands between those of his lord, professed that he did become his man from that day forth, of life, limb, and earthly honour. Blackstone.

7. A husband.

Every wife ought to answer for her man. Addison.

8. A word of familiar address, often implying some degree of impatience and disparagement.

We speak no treason, man. Shak.

9. A piece with which a game, as chess or draughts, is played.—Man of straw, a man of no substantial character, influence, or means; a puppet at the will of another; a person destitute of capital put forward by way of decoy. See straw.

It used to be customary for a number of worthless fellows to loiter about our law-courts, to become false-witness or surety for any one who would buy their services; their badge was a straw in their shoes. Being utterly penniless and without principle, a man of straw became proverbial. Briner.

—Man is used in a few compounds merely to denote the sex, as in man-child, man-servant. It is also used in a great many other compounds whose meanings are sufficiently obvious; as, man-eater, man-hater, man-pleaser, man-slayer, &c.

Man (man), v. t. pret. & pp. manne; ppr. manning. 1. To supply with men; to furnish with a sufficient force or complement of men, as for management, service, defence, or the like; as, to man the lines of a fort or fortress; to man a ship or a boat; to man the capstan.

Mandradora (man-drag'o-ra), n. [L. and Gr. mandragoras.] 1. A genus of herbaceous perennials, popularly called mandrakes, native of the Mediterranean region, having large thick roots, with large stalked undulate root-leaves. The short flower-stalks rise often many together from among the leaves, bearing rather large pale-purple or whitish blossoms with netted veins. They have poisonous properties, and act as emetics, purgatives, and narcotics. See MANDRAKE. — 2. A medical preparation obtained from the mandrake.

Not poppy, nor mandragora,
Nor all the drowsy syrups of the world,
Shall ever medicine thee to that sweet sleep
Which thou ow'st yesterday. Shak.

Mandrake (man'drāk), n. [See MANDRAGORA.] The popular name of plants of the genus Mandragora. They belong to the nat. order Solanaceae, and resemble belladonna in their poisonous properties, but are more narcotic. Aphrodisiac virtues have from time immemorial been ascribed to these plants. The mandrake root, from its occasional resemblance to the lower part of the human body, was formerly supposed to possess an inferior kind of animal life, and the popular belief was that when torn from the ground it uttered such fearful groans that the person who uprooted it went mad.

And shrieks, like mandrakes' torn out of the earth,
That living mortals hearing them run mad. Shak.

Mandrel, Mandril (man'drel, man'dril), n. [Fr. mandrin, from Gr. mandra, an inclosed space, the bed in which the stone of a ring is set.] In mach. a straight bar of iron on which an article having a hole through it is fitted to be turned. It is centred between the lathe-spindle and the spindle of the shifting head. The lathe-spindle is also sometimes called the mandril. The name is also given to any straight bar upon which a tube or ring is welded, and to a plug around which metal and glass are cast.

Manetti (ma-nét'i), n. A variety of rose much used as a dwarf stock in budding.

Manettia (ma-nét'i-a), n. [After Xavier Manetti, professor of botany at Florence.] A genus of climbing under-shrubs, natives of tropical America, nat. order Rubiaceae. The bark of the root of M. cordifolia is emetic, and is regarded in Brazil as a valuable remedy in dropsy and dysentery.

Man-Friday (man-frí-dá), n. [From Friday, the servant of Robinson Crusoe.] A servile follower; a servant of all work.

Manful (man'fúl), a. Having the spirit of a man; bold; brave; courageous; noble; honourable.

Nor know I whether I be very base
Or very manful, whether very wise
Or very foolish. Tennyson.

Manfully (man'fúl-ly), adv. In a manful manner; boldly; courageously; honourably. 'I slew him manfully in fight.' Shak.

Manfulness (man'fúl-nes), n. The quality of being manful; boldness; courageousness.

Mangaby (man-ga-bí), n. [So called by Buffon from Mangaby in Madagascar, of which he supposed it to be a native.] A name given to a monkey (Cercopithecus fuliginosus) of sooty colour, but with naked white eyelids, and belonging to the group of genouens; the white-eyed monkey. Another member of the group is also sometimes so called.

Manganate, Manganate (man'gan-át, man-gan-ér-át), n. A compound of manganic acid with a base.

Manganese (man'gan-éz), n. [Formed by metathesis from magnesium, the name first given to it by Gahn.] Sym. Mn. At. wt. 55. A metal of a dusky white or whitish-gray colour, very hard and difficult to fuse. Exposed to air it speedily oxidizes; it decomposes water at all temperatures. The common ore of manganese is the dioxide, black oxide, or peroxide (MnO₂), the pyroluite of mineralogists, a substance largely employed in the preparation of chlorine, for the manufacture of bleaching-powder or chlorate of lime. It is employed in the manufacture of plate-glass, to correct the yellow colour which oxide of iron is apt to impart to the glass. It is also used in making the black enamel of pottery. One of the ores of manganese, black wadd, is remarkable for its spontaneous inflammation when mixed with oil.

Manganesian (man-gan-ér'i-an), a. Pertaining to manganese; consisting of it or partaking of its qualities.

Manganic (man-gan-ér'ik), a. Same as Manganic.

Manganesium, Manganium (man-gan-ér'-i-um, man-gá-ni-um), n. Manganese (which see).

Manganic (man-gan'ik), a. Obtained from manganese. — Manganic acid, an acid formed from manganese with oxygen. It has not hitherto been obtained in a separate state, but when the hydrate, the carbonate, or the nitrate of potassium is fused with peroxide of manganese, a dark green coloured compound is obtained, long known under the name of chameleon mineral, from the property of its solution to pass rapidly through several shades of colour. This substance has since been termed manganate of potassium (K₂MnO₄).

Manganite (man'gan-it), n. One of the ores of manganese, the hydrated sesquioxide. It is also called Gray Manganese-ore, and is used in the manufacture of glass.

Manganium, n. See MANGANESE.

Mangos (mang'gō), n. [A. Sax. mengon, to mix, O. or Prov. E. meng, ming (D. and G. mengen, to mix), and gō.] A crop of several species of grain grown together; a mixture of wheat and rye or other species of grain.

Mango (mā'ngō), n. [O. Fr. mangon, Fr. mangon, an itching, from démanger, to itch, from manger, I. manduco, to eat. See MANDUCATE. Comp. Sp. comer, to eat, from L. comedere, to eat.] A cutaneous disease very similar to itch in the human subject, and to which horses, cattle, dogs, and other beasts are subject.

Mangel-wurzel (mang'el-wér'zel), n. [G., lit. want-root, but the proper form is mangel-wurzel—G. mangel, beat, and wurzel, root = beat-root.] A variety of beet, Beta vulgaris macrocarpa, extensively cultivated as food for cattle.

Manger (mā'jér), n. [Fr. mangeoire, from manger, I. manduco, manducare, to eat. See MANDUCATE.] 1. A trough or box in which fodder is laid for horses or cattle; the receptacle from which horses or cattle eat in a stable or cow-house.

A church car put into a manger, and there lay growing to keep the horses from their provender.

2. Naut. a space at the fore end of the deck of a ship-of-war, extending abaft of the hawse-boards, and separated from the after-part of the deck by a board (called the manger-board), to prevent the water which enters the hawse-boards from running over the rest of the deck.

Manger-board (mā'jér-bórd), n. The board or bulkhead on a ship's deck that separates the manger from the other part of the deck.

Mangifera (man'jif-er-a), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Anacardiaceae. See MANGO.

Mangily (mā'jil-i), adv. In a mangy or foul manner; meanly.

O, this sounds mangily.

Poorly, and scurvily, in a soldier's mouth.

Ben. & F.

Manginess (mā'jil-nēs), n. The quality or condition of being mangy; scabbiness; infection of the mango.

Mangle (mā'ngl), v. t. pret. & pp. mangled; pp. mangling. [Etymology somewhat doubtful. By some derived from L. manere, maimed, through L. L. mangulere, to mangle. There are also sundry other words with which it might be connected, as A. Sax. be-mænian, to maim; L. G. manē, deficient, mutilated; D. manē, lame; G. mangel, a fault or defect; mangeln, to be wanting; Armor manē, monē, wanting an arm or hand.] 1. To cut by repeated blows, making a ragged or torn wound, or covering with wounds; to tear in cutting; to cut in a bungling manner; to hack, to lacerate; to disfigure by cutting or hacking. applied chiefly to the cutting of flesh.

And, seized with fear, forgot his mangled meat.

2. Fig. to destroy the symmetry or completeness of, to take by piecemeal; to mutilate; to mar through malice or bungling; as, to mangle a passage of an author in quotation; to mangle one's reputation.

Mangle (mā'ngl), n. [D. and G. mangel, from O. Fr. mangelon, Gr. manganon, the axis of a pulley. See MANGONEL.] A well-known machine for smoothing table-cloths, table-napkins, sheets, and other articles of linen or cotton. As formerly made it consisted of an oblong rectangular wooden chest which rested upon two cylinders. The chest was loaded with stones to make it press with sufficient force upon the cylinders, and was moved backwards and forwards by means of a wheel and pinion, the rollers being thus made to pass over and thoroughly press the articles spread on a polished table underneath. Mangles of this construction have, however, been very much superseded by mangles which act in the manner of a calendar, the cloth to be smoothed being passed through between one or more pairs of rollers.

Mangle (mā'ngl), v. t. To smooth cloth with a mangle; to calendar.

Mangler (mā'ngl-ér), n. One who mangles or tears in cutting; one who mars or mutilates.

Mangler (mā'ngl-ér), n. One who uses a mangle.

Mango (mā'ngō), n. [Malay.] 1. The fruit of the mango-tree (Mangifera indica), nat. order Anacardiaceae. The genus Mangifera comprises about fourteen species of trees, with alternate stalked entire leaves and numerous small pink or yellowish flowers in much-branched panicles. They are natives of tropical Asia, but the mango-tree is widely cultivated throughout the tropics. Fine varieties produce a luscious, slightly acid fruit much prized for the dessert. The large flat kernel is nutritious, and has been cooked for food in times of scarcity.—2. A green musk-melon pickled.

Mango-bird (mā'ngō-bérd), n. In ornith. the Indian oriole (Oriolus kundoo).

Mango-fish (mā'ngō-fish), n. [From its beautiful yellow colour resembling that of a ripe mango, or because it appears at the same time as the mango.] A fish of the Ganges (Polynemus Rieu), about 15 inches long, and highly esteemed for food. It is of a beautiful yellow colour, and the pectoral fins have some of the rays extended into long threads. It ascends the Ganges in April and May, and is then sought after as a great delicacy.

Mangold-wurzel (mā'ngöld-wér'zel), n. Same as Mangel-wurzel.

Mangonel (mā'ngō-nel), n. [O. Fr. mangonel, Fr. mangoneau, It. manganello, mangano, from Gr. manganon, a machine for defending fortifications.] An engine formerly used for throwing stones and battering walls.

Mangonism (mā'ngō-nizm), n. The art of mangonizing or of setting off to advantage. Boisj.

Mangonist (mā'ngō-nist), n. 1. One who mangonizes or furnishes up worthless articles for sale. Marston.—2. A slave-dealer.

3. A strumpet.

Mangoniser (mā'ngō-nis-ér), v. t. [L. mangonizo, to set off, from mango, a dealer who sets off his wares by furnishing them up.] 1. To polish or furnish up for setting off to advantage. B. Jonson.—2. To latten, as slaves, for sale.

Mangosteen (mā'ngō-stēn), n. Same as Mangostan.

Mangostan (mā'ngō-stān), n. [Malay mangusta, mangia.] A tree of the East Indies, Garcinia Mangostana, nat. order Clusiaceae or Guttiferae. The tree grows to the height of 18 feet, and the fruit is about the size of an orange, and is one of the most delicious and wholesome of all known fruits. See GARCINIA.

Mango-tree (mā'ngō-trē), n. Mangifera indica. See MANGO.

Mangrove (mā'ngrōv), n. [Malay manggi-manggi.] 1. A tree of the East and West Indies, Rhizophora Mangle, nat. order Rhizophoraceae. The wood is dark-red, hard, and durable, and the bark is used for tanning.

The fruit is said to be sweet and edible, and the fermented juice is made into a kind of light wine. The seeds of mangrove germinate in the seed-vessel, the root growing downwards till it fixes itself in the mud. The red mangrove (R. Corall) is found in the West Indies, where it is used for the cure of fevers, as well as of the bites of venomous insects. The bark is used in dyeing red, and the wood is heavy and takes a fine polish. The white mangrove of Brazil is a species of Avicennia, A. tomentosa, nat. order Verbenaceae. Its bark is of great use at Rio Janeiro for tanning. The soft part of the bark of the white mangrove is formed into rope.—2. The mango-fish (which see).

Fruit of Mangrove (Rhizophora Mangle).

Mangrove-hen (mā'ngrōv-hen), n. A West Indian bird, a species of rail (Rallus longirostris).

They inhabit the warmer parts of Asia and Four-toed or African Manis (M. africana).

Africa, and feed on ants, the mounds of which they break into with their claws, which in walking are turned in. They differ from the true ant-eaters of South America in little else than in being provided with a scaly integument, and constitute with them and the armadillo the family Dasyptidae. When attacked they roll themselves up like a hedgehog, their scales, which are capable of inflicting unpleasant wounds in the hands of man and the mouths of voracious animals, standing boldly out.

Manito, Manitou (man'i-to, man'i-to), n. Among certain of the American Indians, a name given to whatever is an object of religious awe or reverence, whether a good or evil spirit or a fetish. Two manitos or spirits are spoken of by pre-eminence, the one the spirit of good, the other the spirit of evil. See TRACT.

Like the Manito the mighty,
 He the Master of Life one galled
 As an egg with point projecting
 To the four winds of the horizon.
 If everywhere is the Great Spirit,
 Was the meaning of the symbol.
 Like the Manito the mighty,
 He, the dreadful Spirit of Evil,
 As a serpent was depicted.
 As Kneaded, the great serpent.
 Very crafty very cunning.
 He the creeping Spirit of Evil,
 Was the meaning of this symbol. Longfellow.

Mantrunk (man'trunk), n. [L. manus, the hand, and truncus, trunk.] In entom.

Manna (man'na), n. [Generally derived from the Heb. man hu, what is it?] 1. In Script. a substance miraculously furnished as food for the Israelites in their journey through the wilderness of Arabia. Ex. xvi. 15. What the substance was is unknown. Ehrenberg, in his Symbols Physico, affirms it to have been the saccharine substance called Mount Sinai manna yielded by the shrub Tamariscus mannifera of that region, a species of tamarisk. Hence—2. Divine or spiritual food. 3. In phar. the sweet concrete juice which is obtained by incisions made in the stem of a species of ash, Frazinus Ornus, a native of Sicily, Calabria, and other parts of the south of Europe. It is either naturally concreted or exsiccated and purified by art. At the present day the manna of commerce is collected exclusively in Sicily, where the manna-ash is cultivated for the purpose in regular plantations, called frasinetti. The best manna is in oblong pieces or flakes of a whitish or pale yellow colour, light, friable, and somewhat transparent. It has a slight peculiar odour, and a sweetish taste mixed with a slight degree of bitterness, and is employed as a gentle laxative for children or persons of weak habits. It is, however, generally used as an adjunct to other more active medicines. It consists principally of a crystallizable sugar named mannite, and an uncrystallizable sugar which possesses the sweet and purgative properties. Other sweetish secretions exuded by some other plants growing in warm and dry climates, as the Eucalyptus mannifera of Australia, the Tamaris mannifera or gallica of Arabia and Syria, are considered to be kinds of manna. Small quantities of manna, known under the name of Briançon manna, are obtained from the common larch (Larix europæa).

Manna-ash (man'na-ash), n. Frazinus Ornus. See MANNA.

Manna-croup (man'na-krop), n. 1. A granular preparation of wheat-flour deprived of bran. It consists of the large hard grains of wheat-flour retained in the bolting-machine after the fine flour has been passed through its meshes. The French call it semoule or semouline, and the finest kind of it is said to be made in the south of France. It is used for making soups, puddings, &c.—2. The prepared seeds of a grass, Glyceria fluitans.

Manner (man'ér), n. [O.E. manere, from Fr. manière, manner, from O. Fr. manier, of or belonging to the hand, from L. manus, the hand—properly, the method of handling a thing.] 1. The mode in which anything is done; the way of performing or effecting anything; mode of action; method; style; form; fashion.

Find thou the manner, and the means prepare. Dryden.

The temptations of prosperity insinuate themselves after a gentle, but very powerful, manner. Atterbury.

2. Especially, customary or characteristic mode of acting, conducting one's self, and the like; peculiar or habitual way or carriage; habitual style, bearing, or conduct.

Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them. Acts xvii. 2.

It can hardly be imagined how great a difference was in the humour, disposition, and manner of the army under Essex, and the other under Waller. Clarendon.

Air and manner are more expressive than words. Richardson.

Specifically, (a) the characteristic style of writing or thought in an author, or the distinctive peculiarity of an artist. See extract under MANNERISM. (b) pl. General way of life; customary conduct; morals; habits.

Manners with fortunes, humours turn with climes, Tenets with books, and principles with times. Pope.

(c) pl. Carriage or behaviour, considered as decorous or indecorous, polite or unpolite, pleasing or displeasing; especially, ceremonious behaviour; decent and respectful deportment; civility.

Good manners is the art of making those people easy with whom we converse. Swift.

Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners. Middleton.

Shall we, in our applications to the great God, take that to be religion, which the common reason of mankind will not allow to be manners? South.

3. Sort; kind: in this use having often the sense of a plural = sorts, kinds.

Ye tithe mint and rue and all manner of herbs. Luke xi. 22.

Blessed are ye, when men ... shall say all manner of evil against you falsely. Mat. v. 11.

—In a manner, in a certain degree, measure, or sense; to a certain extent; as, it is in a manner done already.

The bread is in a manner common. 1 Sam. xxi. 5. Augustinus does in a manner confess the charge. Baker.

Mannered as she is born. Shak.

2. In the fine arts, exhibiting the peculiar style of an author or artist, more particularly in its objectionable form. 'Hence inspiration plans his manniered lays.' Grain-ger.

Mannerism (man'nér-izm), n. Adherence to the same manner; uniformity of manner, especially a tasteless uniformity, without freedom or variety; excessive adherence to a characteristic mode or manner of action or treatment.

Mannerism is pardonable, and is sometimes even agreeable, when the manner, though vicious, is natural. Few readers, for example, would be willing to part with the mannerism of Milton or of Burke. But a mannerism which does not sit easy on the mannerist, which has been adopted on principle, and which can be sustained only by constant effort, is always offensive. And such is the mannerism of Johnson. Macaulay.

Mannerist (man'nér-ist), n. One addicted to mannerism; one who in action or treatment adheres to one unvaried manner, whether natural or copied; said especially of writers and artists. See extract under MANNERISM.

Mannerliness (man'nér-li-nes), n. The quality of being mannerly, or civil and respectful in behaviour; civility; complaisance.

Mannerly (man'nér-li), a. Showing good manners; correct in deportment; civil; respectful; complaisant; not rude or vulgar.

What thou think'st meet and is most mannerly. Shak.

Mannerly (man'nér-li), adv. With good manners or civility; respectfully; without rudeness.

Better it is to lap one's pottage like a dog, than to eat it mannerly with a spoon of the devil's giving. Fuller.

Manners-bit (man'nérz-bit), n. A portion of a dish left by guests that the host may not feel himself reproached for insufficient preparation. [Local.]

Mannheim Gold (man'him göld), n. [From Mannheim, in Baden, where it was originally made.] A brass containing 80 parts copper and 20 parts zinc, used by jewellers to imitate gold.

Mannikin (man'i-kin), n. Same as Manikin. Beattie.

Mannish (man'ish), a. 1. Having the nature of man; proper to the human species; human. Gover. [Rare.]—2. Characteristic of or resembling a man as distinguished from a woman; hence, as applied to a woman, masculine; unwomanly. 'A woman impudent and mannish grown.' Shak.

She's as much too mannish as he too womanish. Beau. & Fl.

3. Simulating manhood; having the air or appearance of manliness without the reality. [Rare.]

We'll have a swashing and a martial outside
As many other mannish cowards have. Shak.

4. Characteristic of the age of manhood. 'Though now our voices have got the mannish crack.' Shak.

Mannishly (man'ish-ly), adv. In a mannish manner; boldly.

Mannishness (man'ish-nes), n. The state or quality of being mannish; boldness; masculineness. 'The painted faces, the mannishness, and monstrous disguisedness of one sex.' Bp. Hall.

Mannite (man'tt), n. ($C_6H_{12}O_6$) A peculiar variety of sugar obtained from manna, of which it forms the greater part. When manna is dissolved in boiling alcohol, the solution as it cools deposits the mannite in flaky and circular crystals, often arranged in concentric groups. It is also found in the juices which exude from several species of cherry and apple, in various mushrooms, in some roots, such as that of celery, in the fermented juice of beet-root, carrots, onions, &c., and also in some sea-weeds, such as Laminaria saccharina. It has a faint sweetish taste. Called also Mushroom-sugar.

Manœuvre (ma-nü'vér or ma-nü'vér), n. [Fr. manœuvre—main, L. manus, the hand, and œuvre, L. opera, work.] 1. A regulated, dexterous movement, particularly in an army or navy; any evolution, movement, or change of position among companies, battalions, regiments, ships, &c., for the purpose of distributing the forces in the best manner to meet the enemy.

The English commander wore close round upon the enemy, and actually separated their line, placing the central ships of the French between two fires. This bold and masterly manœuvre proved decisive. Belsham.

2. Management with address or artful design; an adroit procedure; intrigue; stratagem.

To make them the principal, not the secondary theatre of their manœuvres for securing a determined majority in Parliament. Burke.

3. A silly affected trick of manner to attract notice; as, he is full of manœuvres. [Scotch.]

Manœuvrer (ma-nū'vēr or ma-nū'vēr), v.t. pret. & pp. manœuvred; ppr. manœuvring. 1. To perform manœuvres; to move or change positions among troops or ships for the purpose of advantageous attack or defence, or in military exercise for the purpose of discipline.—2. To manage with address or art; to employ intrigue or stratagem to effect a purpose.

Manœuvrer (ma-nū'vēr or ma-nū'vēr), v.t. To change the position of, as troops or ships; to make to perform evolutions.

Sir Geo. Rodney . . . now manœuvred the fleet with such skill, as to gain the wind of the enemy during the night and entirely to preclude their retreat. Betham.

Manœuvrer (ma-nū'vēr-ēr or ma-nū'vēr-ēr), n. One who manœuvres.

Man-of-straw (man'ov-strā), n. See under MAN.

Man-of-war (man'ov-war), n. An armed ship; a government vessel, employed for the purposes of war.—Man-of-war bird. Same as Frigate-bird (which see).—Portuguese man-of-war, a sailor's name for the Physalia pelagica or atlantica. See PHYSALLIA.

Man-of-war's-man (man'ov-war'man), n. A seaman belonging to a ship-of-war.

Manometer, Manoscope (ma-nom'et-ēr, man'ō-skōp), n. [Gr. manos, rare, not dense, and metron, measure, skopos, to view.] An instrument to measure or show the alterations in the rarity or density of the air, or to measure the rarity of any gas. As, however, the rarity of a gas is proportional to its elastic force, so long as its temperature and chemical composition remain unchanged, such instruments as measure the elastic force of gases or steam are also properly termed manometers. They are variously constructed.

Manometric, Manometrical (man'ō-met'rik, man'ō-met'rik-al), a. Pertaining to the manometer; made by the manometer; as, manometric observations.

Manor (man'or), n. [O. Fr. manoir, manoir, manoir, L. L. manerium, a dwelling-place, a mansion, from L. maneo, to stay, to dwell.] 1. † Dwelling; habitation. Chaucer.—2. In law, a lordship or barony held by a lord and subject to the jurisdiction of a court-baron held by him; the jurisdiction appertaining to such a court.

Manor was originally a district of ground held by a lord or great personage who kept to himself such parts of it as were necessary for his own use, which were called terre dominicale, or demesne lands, and distributed the rest to freehold tenants. . . . Manors were also called baronies, as they still are lordships, and each baron or lord was empowered to hold a domestic court called the court baron for redressing misdemeanours and nuisances within the manor, and for settling disputes of property among the tenants. Mackay & Whately.

3. In American law, a tract of land occupied by tenants who pay a fee-farm rent to the proprietor, sometimes in kind, and sometimes perform certain stipulated services. Burrill.

2 To enrich, as soils, with fertilizing substances, as dung, guano, ashes, lime, fish, or any vegetable or animal substance, to supply with manure, as, to manure a field; to manure a crop.

The crops of half bar counts
Manure the fields of Thomsby.

Manure (ma-nū'r), n. [From the verb.] Any matter or substance added to the soil with the view of fertilizing it, or of accelerating vegetation and increasing the production of the crops, every substance which is used to improve the natural soil, or to restore to it the fertility which is diminished by the crops annually carried away. Animal, vegetable, and mineral substances are used for this purpose. Animal substances employed as manure comprehend the putrefying carcasses of animals, ground bones, blood, the secretions of animals, as the dung of horses, cattle, sheep, poultry, &c., urine, guano (the decomposed excrement of aquatic birds), the scrapings of leather, horn, and the refuse of the shambles, the hair or wool of animals. Liquid manure, consisting of town sewage, the drainings of dung heaps, stables, and cow houses, is largely employed in many districts. Although farmers generally prefer to absorb the liquid excrements of their cattle by means of straw, yet sometimes more is produced than can be absorbed. In this case it is collected in tanks and distributed, sometimes from a large barrel drawn by a horse, over the fields, sometimes by a force pump and hose, and sometimes by simple gravitation. The liquid manure of some large cities, as Edinburgh, is thus utilized, and increasing attention is being paid to this use of it, both from sanitary motives and its high value as a fertilizer. It is used chiefly to promote the growth of grass. Almost every kind of vegetable substance, in one state or another, is used as manure. The principal mineral substances employed as manures are lime and other alkaline substances, chalk, sand, clay, marl, various sulphates, phosphates, nitrates, &c.

Many (men-i), a. [A Sax. manig, manig, manig, Goth. manig, D. manig, Dan. manig, O.H.G. manig, O. manig, many in A. Sax. manig was used as an adjective (like O. manig) with both singular and plural, as, manig bura, many a city, manig man, many a man. manig men, many men. It was not till the thirteenth century that the indefinite article was used between it and the noun, as in 'many a man.' Grimm explains the word as derived from man, O. mann and the word may have originally meant any man or a number of men. Another supposition is that it contains a nasalized form of the root man, man, seen in man, man, L. manus, &c.] Numerous, comprising a great number of individuals.

Many are the afflictions of the righteous. Ps. 102:7

Maormor (mā'mō'r), n. [Gael. maor, maor, a royal steward, and maor great.] Lit a royal steward of high dignity and power, placed by the King of Scotland over a province instead of a thanage, and exercising the office of royal deputy, enjoying a third part of its revenues. Written also Maormor (which see).

Map (map), n. [L. mapa, a Punic word signifying a napkin, table-cupkin—mapa, mapa, (Fr. mappemonde, It. mappamondo), a delineation of the earth on a cloth, a map.]

1. A representation of the surface of the earth or of any part of it, or of the whole or any part of the celestial sphere, usually drawn on paper or other material (See Chart). The surface represented being spherical, a map upon a plane surface must be laid down according to the laws of perspective, or the representation must be that of the surface of a sphere upon a plane on the principles of perspective. This is what is termed projection. There are five principal projections, the orthographic, the stereographic, the globular, the conical, and the cylindrical or Mercator's, distinguished from each other by the different positions of the projecting point in which the eye is supposed to be placed. A map of the earth, or a portion of the earth, usually exhibits merely the positions of countries, mountains, rivers, lakes, cities, &c., relatively to one another, and by means of lines of latitude and longitude relatively to every other point on the earth's surface. But a map may be so coloured or shaded as to give a variety of information for example to indicate the geological structure, the amount of rainfall, the languages spoken, &c. Hence we have geological, meteorological, linguistic, and other kinds of maps. — 2. Fig. a distinct and precise representation of anything.

Map (map), v. t. pret. & pp. mapped; pres. mapping. To draw or delineate in a chart or map, as the figure of any portion of land; hence, fig. to delineate or describe vividly and accurately often with out, as, the country has been surveyed and mapped out.

I am near to the place where they should stand, if France have mapped it truly. Shak

Maple (mā'pl), n. [A. Sax. mapultra, mapultra, a maple-tree.] A tree of the genus Acer, nat. order Aceraceae or Sapindaceae, peculiar to the northern and temperate parts of the globe. About fifty species are known, distributed through Europe, North America, and different parts of Asia. They are small or large trees, with a sweetish, rarely milky, sap, opposite deciduous, simple, usually lobed leaves, and axillary and terminal racemes or corymbs of small greenish flowers. The characteristic form of the fruit is shown in the figure. Two species are common in Britain, the great maple, often misnamed sycamore (A. pseudo-platanus), and the common maple (A. campestre). The wood of the former is valuable for various purposes, as for musical instruments, saddlery, wooden dishes, and many other articles both of furniture and machinery. The knotted parts of the sugar maple furnish the pretty bird's eye maple of cabinet-makers. The wood of several American species is also applied to various uses. The sugar or rock maple (A. saccharinum) is the most important species, this yields maple-sugar, which in many parts of North America is an important article of manufacture. A tree of ordinary size will yield from 15 to 30 gallons of sap, from which are made from 1 to 4 lbs. of sugar. — Maple-honey, the uncrystallized portion of the sap of the rock maple from which sugar is made. — Maple-sugar, sugar obtained by evaporation from the juice of the rock maple.

Sugar Maple (Acer saccharinum).

Map-mount (map-mount-er), n. A workman who backs maps with canvas, varnishes them, and fixes them on rollers, &c. See Mounts.

Mappery (map'p-ē), n. The art of planning and designing maps. Shak

Maqui (mak'wé), n. An evergreen or sub-evergreen shrub found in Chile, from the juice of whose fruit the Chilians make a kind of wine. It is the best known species of the genus Aristotelia (A. Maga), and is referred to the nat. order Tiliaceae. It is cultivated as an ornamental shrub in England, and its fruit ripens.

Mar (már), n. cf. mar & pp. marred, pp. marrying. [A. Sax. marren, marvan, marvan, to hinder, to obstruct, to lead astray, to spoil. O.E. marren, to mar, lool, marje, to bruise or crush. O.H.G. marrian, M.H.G. marren, to hinder, to make void, from same root as mold (which see). The word passed from the German into the Romance languages. O.Fr. and Fr. marier sp. marir, L.L. marrire, to annoy to injure.] To injure in any way, to spoil, to impair, to deface, to disfigure, to deform.

Neither break thou nor the corners of thy heart.

Let sin up.

When break thou their neck with water. Shak.

But sin is marred, and the good thing is lost. Dryden.

Each passion dimm'd his face.

Thrice changed with pain, ire, envy, and despair.

Which mar'd his borrowed stage. Shak.

Maraschino (már'-shí-no), n. pl. An order of ferns found in South America, the Eastern Pacific Islands, and South Africa, differing from Polypodiaceae in the absence of a jointing ring to the spore-cases, and from Ophioglossaceae in having the sort and the venation circinate.

Maraschino (már'-shí-no), n. (Fr. maraschino, to beg, play the rogue, from maras, a rogue, a vagabond.) To rove in quest of plunder; to make an excursion for booty, to plunder.

Maraschino (már'-shí-no), n. Spoilation by marauders.

While it would expose the whole extent of the surrounding country to maraud and ravage.

Fr. roving.

Maraschino (már'-shí-no), n. One who marauds, a rover in quest of booty or plunder; a plunderer.

The pirates had been a troublesome enemy, because, as flying maraschino, lurking, and watching their opportunities, they could seldom be brought to action. De Quincey.

Maravedi (má-rá-vé-dí), n. (Sp. so called from Marabito, an Arabian dynasty which reigned in Spain and Africa, lit. the standard.) A small copper coin of Spain, less than a farthing sterling. It is no longer current. The gold maravedi, a still older coin was worth about fourteen shillings.

Marble (már'b'l), n. [Fr. marbre, L. marmor, marble, Gr. marmara, any stone or rock which sparkles in the light, from mar-mar, to flash, to gleam.] 1. The popular name of any species of calcareous stone or mineral, of a compact texture and of a beautiful appearance, susceptible of a good polish. Marble is limestone, or a stone which may be calcined to lime, a carbonate of lime, but limestone is a more general name, comprehending the calcareous stones of an inferior texture, as well as those which admit a fine polish. The term is limited by mineralogists and geologists to the several varieties of carbonate of lime which have more or less of a granular and crystalline texture. In sweep the term is applied to several compact or granular kinds of stone susceptible of a very fine polish. The varieties of marble are exceedingly numerous, and greatly diversified in colour. Marble is much used for statues, busts, pillars, chimney-pieces, monuments, &c. By far the largest portion of the marble used by modern sculptors comes from the quarries of Carrara in Italy, but some is also got from Greece. Many sorts of variegated marbles of great beauty are found in Britain.—2. A little ball of marble, of other stone, or of baked clay, used by children in play. 3. A column, tablet, or the like, of marble, remarkable for some inscription or sculpture.—4. Arundel marbles or Arundel marbles, a collection of an ancient sculptured marbles, purchased by Sir William Petty at Smyrna in 1696 for the Earl of Arundel, whose grandson presented it to the University of Oxford. The most curious and interesting portion of this collection is called the Parian Chronicle, from having been kept in the island of Paros. In its perfect state the inscription contained a chronicle of the principal events in Grecian history from the time of mythical or semi-mythical Cæcrops (1682 B.C.) to the archonship of Diogenes (384 B.C.), but part of it is now lost, and what remains is much corroded and defaced.—5. Virgin marbles, a splendid collection of basso-reliefs and fragments of statuary brought from the Purchases at Athens to England by Lord Elgin in 1814, afterwards purchased by the government, and now lodged in the British Museum. The largest part of them (ninety-two pieces in all) were, perhaps, executed from designs by Phidias, and are considered among the finest remains of ancient art.—6. Pow marble, a kind of limestone in which red colours predominate.

Marble (már'b'l), n. 1. Composed of marble; as, a marble pillar.—2. Variegated in colour; stained or veined like marble.

The appendix shall be printed by hand, attached, and with a marble cover. Swift.

3. Hard, insensible, as, a marble heart.

Marble (már'b'l), v. cf. mar & pp. marbled; pp. marbling. To give an appearance of marble to, to stain or veils like marble, as, to marble the edges of a book.

March (mārch), n. [Probably directly from the Fr. marché, a boundary (It. Sp. Pr. Pr. marches), but the word is originally Teutonic. A Sax. meare, a mark, sign, boundary, limit, Goth. marra, a border. See MARE.] A frontier or boundary of a territory; a border; especially applied to the boundaries or confines of political divisions, and also to the country lying near and about such: in Scotland commonly applied to the boundaries, or the marks which determine them, of contiguous estates or lands, whether large or small. The term is most familiar to us as applied to the boundaries between England and Wales, and England and Scotland. The marches of the latter country were divided into two portions, the western and the middle marches, each of which had courts peculiar to itself, and a kind of president or governor, who was called warden of the marches.

Geneva is situated in the marches of several dominions—France, Savoy, and Switzerland. Fuller.

March (mārch), v. 1. To move by steps and in order, as soldiers; to move in a military manner; to walk with a steady regular tread. Spenser.

Beyond the river we'll encamp ourselves,
And on to-morrow bid them march away. Shaks.

March (mārch), v. 2. To walk in a grave, deliberate, or stately manner.

Like thee, great son of Jove, like thee,
When clad in riding majesty,
Thou marchest down o'er Delos' hills. Prior.

Marching (mārch-ing), a. A colloquial term for an infantry regiment of the line: generally used in a disparaging sense. Sir W. Scott.

One was sent to college, the other put in a marching regiment. Lord Lytton.

March (mārch), v. 3. To cause to move in military order; to cause to move in a body; to cause to move in regular procession. 'To march a bloody host.' Shaks.

Because the distracted state of Persia rendered it a prey to the first invader, he marched an army, . . . and took possession of two important provinces. Brongham.

March (mārch), v. 4. To cause to go anywhere at one's command and under one's guidance; as, the policeman marched his prisoner to the police-office.

March (mārch), n. [See the verb.] 1. The measured and uniform walk, or forward movement of a body of men, as soldiers, moving simultaneously and in order; a regular advance of a body of men, in which they keep time with each other and sometimes with music; stately and deliberate walk; steady or laboured progression; used figuratively in regard to poetry from its rhythm resembling the measured harmonious stepping of soldiery.

We came to the roots of the mountain, and had a very troublesome march to gain the top of it. Addison.

Walker was smooth, but Dryden taught to join
The varying verse, the full resounding line,
The long majestic march and energy divine. Pope.

March (mārch), n. 2. An advance of soldiers from one halting place to another; a day's journey of soldiery; the distance passed over; as, a march of 20 miles.

In our third march we found an unexpected supply of food, the hills being full of herds. De For.

March (mārch), n. 3. Progressive development; advancement; progress. 'The march of intellect.' Southey.

And this happens merely because men will not bide their time, but will insist on precipitating the march of affairs. Buckle.

March (mārch), n. 4. A signal to move; a particular beat of the drum.

The drums presently striking up a march, they make no longer stay, but forward they go directly. Keble.

March (mārch), n. 5. In music, a composition of a strongly rhythmic character, either in duple or triple time, designed to accompany and regulate the movement of troops, or other bodies of men. — To make a march, in the game of eucha, to take all the tricks of a single deal. Hoyle. — March post, a march post the reviewing officer or some high dignitary on parade.

Marchantia (mārch-an-ti-ā), n. [In honour of Nicholas Marchant, a French botanist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Hepaticæ, the type of the sub-order Marchantiaceæ (which see).

Marchantia (mārch-an-ti-ā), n. men who lived on the marches of Wales and Scotland, and who, in times past, had their laws and regal power, until they were abolished by 27 Henry VIII.

Marchet (mārch-et), n. [L.L. marceta, a fee of a mark.] A pecuniary fine anciently paid by the tenant to his lord, for the marriage of one of the tenant's daughters. This custom prevailed both in England and Scotland. See MERCET.

Marchioness (mārch-i-on-ess), n. [L.L. marquis, a fee of a mark.] A title of nobility, given to the wife or widow of a marquis; a female having the rank and dignity of a marquis.

March-mad (mārch-mad), a. Extremely foolish or excitable, rash; foolhardy. See under MARCH, the month. Sir W. Scott.

March-man (mārch-man), n. A person living near the march dividing two countries; a borderer.

New Bowden Moor the march-man won,
And sternly shook his plumed head,
As glanced his eye o'er Haldon. Sir W. Scott.

Marchpane (mārch-pān), n. [O.Fr. marc-pain, Fr. masepain, It. marcapan, Sp. marapan, G. marcpan, marzpan, perhaps from L. Gr. massa, a barley-cake, and pantis, bread, or from the names Martius or Marcus and pantis.] A kind of sweet bread or biscuit; a spice-cake composed of sugar, nuts, pine-apple, almonds, sometimes with poppy-seeds and Indian corn; a macaroon.

Good thou, save me a piece of marshpane. Shaks.

March-ward (mārch-wārd), n. A warden of the marches; a marcher.

Marchant (mārch-ant), a. Martial; under the influence of Mars. Chaucer.

Marchid (mārch-id), a. [L. marcidus, from marcere, to pine.] 1. Withered; feeble; drooping; wasted away. 'Marchid dying herbs.' Dryden. — 2. Causing or accompanied by wasting and feebleness. 'A marchid fever.' Harvey.

Marchidity (mārch-id-i-ti), n. Leanness, meagreness. Perry.

Marchionite (mārch-i-on-ite), n. A follower of Marcion, a Gnostic of the second century, who adopted the oriental notion of the two conflicting principles of good and evil, and imagined that between these there existed a third power, neither wholly good nor wholly evil, the creator of the world, and the God of the Jewish dispensation.

Marcite (mārch-ite), n. Same as Marcosia.

Marcobrunn (mārch-kō-brun-ēr), n. A celebrated Rhine wine, possessing much body and aroma, from the Marcobrunn vineyard, between Mainz and Bingen.

Marcosian (mārch-kō-si-an), n. A disciple of Marcus, an Egyptian, a Judeizing Christian, about the second century. The Marcosians were a branch of the Gnostics, and possessed a large number of books which they believed to be canonical. Their opinions seem to have been similar to those of the Socinians.

Marcour (mārch-ūr), n. [L.] The state of withering or wasting; leanness; waste of flesh. [Rare.]

A marcor is either imperfect, tending to a lesser withering, which is curable; or perfect, that is, an entire wasting of the body, which is incurable. Harvey.

Marcus (mārch-ūs), n. A large iron-headed hammer. Weale.

Mare (māre), n. [A. Sax. mare, mare, myre, a mare, mear, meark, a horse; Icel. mar, a horse, marv, a mare, G. mähre, a mare, O.H.G. marah, marah, a horse; allied to Ir. marc, W. marok, a horse.] The female of the horse or of other species of the genus Equus. — Mare's nest, an absurd or extremely ridiculous discovery; a discovery that is no discovery: usually a person is said to find a mare's nest when he chuckles over some discovery which he thinks he has made, but which turns out to be a hoax or self-delusion.

Why dost thou laugh?
What mare's nest hast thou found? Bacon & Ft.

— The gray mare is the better horse. See GRAY-MARE.

Maret (māre), n. [A. Sax. maru, an incubus; Icel. maru, the nightmare, an ogre; Prov. G. mar, nachtmar, whence Fr. cauchemar, nightmare (caucher, L. causare, to oppress); Pol. maru, a vision, dream, nightmare; Bohem. maru, an incubus.] A sense of pressure across the chest, occurring during sleep, accompanied with sighing, suffocative panting, intercepted utterance; the incubus. [It is now used only in the compound nightmare.]

Mushrooms cause the incubus, or the mare in the stomach. Bacon.

Mareca (māre-ka), n. A genus of palmiped birds, containing the widgeon (Mareca penelope).

Marekanite (māre-kan-ite), n. A variety of obsidian, found at Marekhan in Siberia, in small spherules: it is a form of peridot.

Maremme (ma-rem-me), n. pl. Maremme (ma-rem-me). [It.] Tracts of country in middle Italy, which, by reason of the unhealthy exhalations of a soil abounding in sulphur and alum, cannot be inhabited in summer without danger. The word is also sometimes used to signify the malaria or unhealthy vapour exhaled from the soil.

Marema (ma-rē-ma), n. [G. marina, maritime, from Lake Noris, in Brandenburg, Prussia.] A name sometimes applied to one or two fishes of the genus Coregonus.

Marechal (māre-shal), n. (See MARSHAL.) The chief commander of an army; marshal.

O, William, may thy arms advance,
That he may lose Dinant next year,
And so be marechal of France. Prior.

Marg (mārch), n. plant, Hippocrepis

Marg (mārch), n. 2. A name of clouds, and indicates

Margarite (mārch-ā-rit), n. a salt

Margarite (mārch-ā-rit), n. widely dis-

Margarite (mārch-ā-rit), n. of the oily

Margarite (mārch-ā-rit), n. It is found in several species of animal and vegetable fats and oils, particularly in human fat, in goose fat, and in olive-oil. It is also produced by the action of heat on tallow and on stearic acid, and by the oxidation of stearic acid. It has a fatty aspect, and is insoluble in water, but is readily soluble in hot alcohol; the latter, as it cools, deposits the acid in pearly scales: hence its name. With bases it forms two series of salts, the one neutral and the other acid.

Margarin (mārch-ā-rin), n. A peculiar pear-like substance extracted from hog's lard; the solid fatty matter of certain vegetable oils. The purest margarin is obtained from the concrete portion of olive-oil.

Margaritaceæ (mārch-ā-rit-ā-sē-sē), n. pl. A family of lamellibranchiate molluscs containing many genera of much interest; the pearl-oyster. The most important is the Avicula, one species of which, the A. (Melegrina) margaritifera, produces the most valued pearls, as well as the greatest quantity of mother-of-pearl.

Margaritaceus (mārch-ā-rit-ā-sē-sē), a. Pearly, or resembling pearl.

Margarite (mārch-ā-rit), n. [L. margaritis, Gr. margaritis, pearl, from Per. marward, a pearl.] 1. A pearl. 'The margarites or pearls.' Sp. King. — 2. A mineral of a grayish-white colour found in Tyrol. It generally occurs with shifitum.

Margarine (mar-gə-rī'k), n. Pertaining to or resembling pearl or margarite. — Margaritic acid, one of the fatty acids which result from the saponification of castor-oil.

Margaritiferous (mar-gə-rī-tī'fə-rəs), a. Producing pearls.

Margaron, Margarone (mar-gə-rōn), n. [Fr. margarone. See MARGARITE.] A solid white fatty matter which crystallizes in pearly scales, and is obtained by distilling margaric acid with excess of lime.

Margarous (mar-gə-rəs), a. A term applied to a fatty acid containing less of oxygen than margaric acid.

Margay (mā'gā), n. A Brazilian animal of the cat kind, the Felis Margay or F. tigris. It is about the size of the domestic cat, is of a pale fawn colour, with black bands on the fore-paws, and leopard-like spots on the hind-parts and on the long bushy tail. So of old Was blood and life at a low market sold. Dryden.

6. In law, the privilege of having a public market. Market is defined by statute to be the liberty by grant or prescription whereby a town is enabled to set up and open shops, &c., at a certain place therein, for buying and selling, and better provision of such victuals as the subject wanteth. The general rule of law is, that all sales and contracts of anything vendible in fairs or markets—overt (that is, open markets) shall not only be good between the parties, but also binding on all those that have any right or property therein. The law of Scotland differs from that of England as to the legal effect of a sale in open market. The English law recognizes the principle that property may, in some cases, be transferred by sale, although the seller has no right of property in the goods. In Scotland, no such privilege is attached to sales in open market; and the owner of goods sold by one who has stolen them, or to whom they may have been lent, may reclaim them from the purchaser.—Market is the first part of a considerable number of compound words of obvious signification; such as, market-day, market-place, market-town.

Cayenne, D. dactylops of Surinam. Instead of a bag this animal has two longitudinal folds near the thighs, which serve to inclose the young, which it has the singular habit of carrying about with it on its back. Called also Merri's Opossum.

Marmonet (má-mó-net), n. [Fr. marmonet, dim. of marmon, a monkey.] A small American monkey of the genus Jaechia, distinguished from the rest of the American monkeys by the absence of the additional molar, and by the sharpness and crookedness of their snail. They are very nimble and agile in their movements, and extremely cautious in their habits. Their ears are generally tufted. Called also Ousseti.

I will instruct thee how To share the nimble marmonet. Shak.

Marmot (má-mót), n. [Fr. armotte; It. armotta, armottina, from L. mus (mouse) musculus, mountain mouse.] A rodent quadruped of the genus Arctomys, classed with the Merula or with the Sciurida. The marmots have five molar teeth above and four below, short legs, a round and rather short tail, and a flattened head. They live in communities, burrow on the sides of high mountains, and are dormant in winter. There are many species, European, Asiatic, and American. The alpine marmot is the A. alpinus, about the size of a rabbit; it inhabits the higher regions of the Alps and Pyrenees. The A. marmota is the groundhog or woodchuck of North America.

Marmoset (má-mó-set), n. See MARMOSET.

Maronite (má-rún-í), n. A follower of Maron, an inhabitant of the mountains of Lebanon in Syria. The sect of the Maronites originated at the end of the sixth century, and held at first the opinions of the Monothelites, though they now deny holding them. Their church constitution resembles that of the old Greek Church. Since the twelfth century they have several times submitted to the pope and joined the Roman Catholic Church, without, however, giving up their own peculiarities.

Maroon (má-rún), n. [Fr. maroon, applied to a runaway slave, abbrev. of Sp. amarron, wild, unruly, probably from cima, the top of a hill, negro amarron, and simply amarron, in Cuba, a fugitive or outlawed negro hidden in a wood or on a hill.] 1. A name given to fugitive slaves living on the mountains in the West Indian Islands and Guiana. 2. A bright white light used for signals in the East Indies.

Maroon (má-rún), s. i. To put ashore and leave on a desolate island, by way of punishment, as was done by the buccanniers, &c. Falconer. — To go marooning, to go on a party of pleasure to the country. A marooning party differs from a picnic in that several days are spent on the shore or in the country instead of only one. (Southern States of America.)

Marque (mâr'k), n. [Fr. marque. See MARK and MAROH, a limit, a frontier.] A license to make reprisals on the belongings of a public enemy, usually in the phrase letters of marque or letters of marque and reprisal, which means: (a) originally, a commission granted by the supreme authority of a state to a subject, empowering him to pass the frontiers (marque) that is, enter an enemy's territories and capture the goods and persons of the enemy in return for goods or persons taken by him. (b) In present usage, a license or extraordinary commission granted by a sovereign or the supreme power of one state to the citizens of this state to make reprisals at sea on the subjects of another, under pretence of indemnification for injuries received; that is, a license to engage in privateering. Letters of marque were abolished among European nations by the Treaty of Paris of 1856. The United States of America were invited to accede to this agreement, but declined. Hence the term letter of marque is sometimes applied to a private vessel commissioned to attack and capture the vessels of an enemy: a privateer. Called also Letters of Mark, Letters of Mart.

Marquis, Marquess (mâr'kwis, mâr'kwes), n. [Fr. marquis, it. marchese, L.L. marchio, marchio, marchensis, a prefect of the marches or border territories. See MARK and MAROH, a boundary.] Originally, the name of an officer whose duty was to guard the marches or frontiers of the kingdom; now a title of dignity in Britain next in rank to that of duke, and hence the second of the five orders of English nobility. Corresponding titles exist in France, Italy, and Germany. In Britain the title is often attached to a dukedom as a second title, and held by the eldest son during the lifetime of the father. Marquises in Britain have this privilege above earls, that their younger sons are addressed as 'my lord.' The wife of a marquis is styled marquess. The coronet of a marquis consists of a richly chased circle of gold, with four strawberry leaves and four balls or large pearls set on short points on its edge; the cap crimson velvet, with a gold tassel on the top, and turned up with ermine. — Lady marquess is used by Shakespeare for marquioness.

You shall have two noble partners with you; the old Duchess of Norfolk, and Lady Marquess. Dunct. Shak.

Marriage (ma'rij), n. [Fr. marriage, Pr. maridatge, marriage, It. maritaggio, L.L. maritaticum, marriage, from L. maritus, a husband, from mas, maris, a male.] 1. The act of uniting a man and woman for life: the legal union of a man and woman for life; the state or condition of being married; wedlock. Marriage is regarded by the law as a civil contract binding the parties to certain reciprocal obligations, and the general principle of law respecting this, as well as other civil contracts, is, that it is to be held valid according to the usage of the country wherein it is made. Although among Protestants marriage has ceased to be regarded as a sacrament, yet in most Protestant countries the entrance into the married state has continued to be accompanied with religious observances. These are not, however, in the eye of the law, essential to the constitution of a valid marriage, any further than the sovereign power may have seen it proper to annex them to and incorporate them with the civil contract. By the law of England marriages may be solemnized—1. According to the rites of the Church; or 2. According to the provisions of the act 6 and 7 Will. IV. lxxxv., amended by 1 Vict. xli., and various subsequent acts. Marriages, according to the rites of the Church, are celebrated or solemnized by banns; by notice in lieu of banns, which is a license dispensing with the publication of banns; or, by license from a bishop, which dispenses with both the preceding forms. Marriages of Dissenters, as of Jews, Quakers, Roman Catholics, and other sects and persuasions, may be legally and adequately solemnized in their own synagogues, tabernacles, chapels, or meeting-houses, subject to a few necessary restrictions. In accordance with the provisions of the act above cited, marriage may take place by the certificate of the superintendent-registrar for the poor-law union, parish, or place in which the parties reside, with or without license. By the law of Scotland marriages may be either regular or irregular, and irregular marriages are by mere consent without the intervention of a clergyman. A regular marriage is performed by a clergyman in presence of at least two witnesses, and is preceded by the proclamation of banns according to the rules of the Church, or by intimation to a registrar and publication outside the registrar's office. The second kind of marriage may be contracted by any form of ceremony, without the proclamation of banns or the aid of a clergyman, provided the parties on the occasion express a solemn acceptance of each other as man and wife. It is also contracted by the writing of the parties without any ceremony, provided the writing express their acceptance of each other as man and wife. A marriage may also be constituted by the verbal acceptance of each other by the parties as man and wife in the presence of witnesses, or by a promise followed by intercourse. Also when a man and a woman live and cohabit together, and conduct themselves as man and wife in the society and neighbourhood of which they are members, till the belief and reputation that they are married become general, their marriage is presumed without any evidence of a marriage having been entered into.

Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undressed. Heb. xli. 4.

O, Hamlet, what a falling off was there! From me, whose love was of that dignity That it went hand in hand even with the vow I made to her in marriage. Shak.

The reason why so few marriages are happy is because young ladies spend their time in making nets, not in making cages. Swift.

2. A feast made on the occasion of a marriage.

The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king, which made a marriage for his son. Mat. xxii. 2.

3. Intimate union. Let me not to the marriage of true minds Admit impediments. Shak.

—Complex marriage, that peculiar domestic relation between the sexes existing in the American sect calling themselves Perfectionists. See extract.

The central domestic fact of the household is the complex marriage of its members to each other, and to all; a rite which is to be understood as taking place on the entrance of every new member, whether male or female, into association; and which is said to convert the whole body into one marriage circle; every man becoming the husband and brother of every woman; every woman the wife and sister of every man. Hepworth Dixon.

—Marriage articles or marriage contract, contract or agreement on which a marriage is founded. —Marriage favours, knots of white ribbons or bunches of white flowers worn at weddings. —Marriage portion, a portion given to a woman at her marriage. —Marriage settlement, an arrangement usually made before marriage, and in consideration of it, whereby a jointure is secured to the wife, and portions to children, in the event of the husband's death. —Marriage, Wedding, Nuptials, Matrimony, Wedlock. Marriage is the union, or the act of forming or entering into the union; wedding is rather the ceremonies celebrating the union or marriage, but not essential to it. Marriages are often constituted without a wedding. Nuptials is the Latin word for wedding, but is used in a more dignified sense—we say a village wedding, but the nuptials of a prince; matrimony is the married state, or the state into which marriage brings us; wedlock is the Anglo-Saxon or vernacular English word for matrimony, and hardly differs from it in meaning. Marriage is sometimes used for matrimony, but matrimony is never used for marriage. —SYN. Matrimony, wedlock, wedding, nuptials.

Marriageable (ma'rij-a-bl), a. 1. Of an age suitable for marriage. 'A young heiress whom I begin to look upon as marriageable.' Spectator. — 2. Suitable for close union.

2 In physics, the quantity of matter in any body, or the sum of all the material particles of a body. The mass of a body is estimated by its weight, whatever be its figure, or whether its bulk or magnitude be great or small. In much the mass multiplied into the intensity of gravity at the place constitutes the weight of the body, so that the weight being denoted by W , the mass by M , and the measure of gravity by g , then

$W = g M$, and therefore $M = \frac{W}{g}$. This quantity g , which is independent of the particular nature of the body, is thus the weight of what is arbitrarily assumed to represent the unit of mass. Also, if v represent the weight of the unit of volume, and V the volume of the body, then is $W = v V$ and $M = \frac{v}{g} V$.—The mass, the great body of the people, more especially of the working-class and lower orders, the populace.

And o'er his eyebrows hung his matted hair.
Dryden.

Mat (mat), v.i. To grow thick together; to become interwoven like a mat.

Mat, Matt (mat), n. [Perhaps contr. of mater.] In copper-smelting, the alloy of copper, tin, iron, &c., otherwise called White-metal.

Matachin, n. See MATTACHIN.

Mataco (mat'a-kó), n. The three-banded armadillo; an edentate mammal of the genus Dasypus (D. trilineatus of Linn.), remarkable for its power of rolling itself into a ball when alarmed.

Matador, Matadore (mat'a-dór), n. [Sp., from matar, L. mactare, to kill, to sacrifice.] 1. One who kills; the killer; the man appointed to kill the bull in bull-fights. He is handsomely dressed; in his right hand he carries a naked sword, and in his left the muleta, a small stick with a piece of scarlet silk attached. When the bull is excited to fury by the annoying attacks of the picadores and banderilleros, the matador steps gravely up and plunges his sword into the animal near the left shoulder-blade, when it drops dead at his feet.—2. One of the three principal cards in the games of ombre and quadrille, which are always two black aces and the deuce in spades and clubs, and the seven in hearts and diamonds. These are termed murdering cards, because they win all others.

Matafund (mat'a-fund), n. [Sp. matar, to kill, and L. funda, a sling.] A kind of sling. 'That murderous sling the matafund.'
Southey.

Matamata (má-ta-má'ta), n. A curious South American tortoise, with a small carapace and exposed head and feet. Its brown carapace is covered with pyramidal eminences, and its body is curiously fimbriated. It is the Chelys fimbriata.

Match (mach), n. [Fr. mèche, a match, Pr. mèche, It. miccia, L. and Gr. myxus, myxos, the nozzle of a lamp.] Anything that catches fire readily either from a spark or by friction, and is used for retaining, conveying, and communicating fire. Formerly, hemp, flax, cotton, or tow dipped in sulphur, coarse paper saturated with nitre, splints of wood tipped with sulphur, a species of dry wood called touchwood, were used as matches, but these have been almost entirely superseded for domestic purposes by lucifer or congrue matches, or varieties of them under the name of vesuvians, fuseses, vestas, &c.—Quick match, a match made of threads of cotton, or cotton wick, steeped in gummed brandy or whisky, then soaked in a paste of meal powder and gummed spirits, and afterwards strewn over with meal powder. It burns at the rate of a yard in 13 seconds, and is used to prime heavy mortars, &c.—Slow match, a match made to burn very slowly, as at the rate of 4 or 5 inches an hour, and used for blasting purposes, artillery, &c.—To prime a match, is to prepare the match so as to be easily ignitable by putting on the end of it some wet bruised powder, made into a sort of paste.

Match (mach), n. [Another form of O.E. and Sc. maks, a mate, companion, or equal; A.S. maec, gemæc, a mate, a wife. See MAKE and also MATE.] 1. A person equal or similar to another in quality; one able to mate or cope with another; an equal; a mate; a companion.

Government makes an innocent man, though of the lowest rank, a match for the mightiest of his fellow-subjects.
Addison.

2. The bringing together of two parties suited to one another, as for a union, a trial of strength or skill, a contest, or the like; specifically, (a) a competition for victory; a union of parties for contest, as in games or sports.

A solemn match was made; he lost the prize.
Dryden.

(b) Union by marriage.

Love doth seldom suffer itself to be confined by other matches than those of its own making.
Boyle.

3. One to be married; one to be gained in marriage.

She inherited a fair fortune of her own, . . . and was looked upon as the richest match of the West.
Clarendon.

Match (mach), v.t. 1. To be a match or mate for; to be able to compete with; to equal.

No settled senses of the world can match the pleasure of that madness.
Shak.

2. To show an equal to; to place in competition or comparison with.

No history or antiquity can match his policies and his conduct.
South.

A discord. Dragons of the prime,
That tare each other in their slime,
Were mellow music match'd with him.
Tennyson.

3. To oppose as equal; to set against as equal in contest.

Eternal might
To match with their inventions they presum'd
So easy, and of his thunder made a scorn.
Milton.

4. To suit; to make equal; to make to correspond or harmonize; to proportion. 'Matching of patterns and colours.'
Swift.

Let poets match their subject to their strength.
Racine.

5. To marry; to give in marriage.

A senator of Rome, while Rome surviv'd,
Would not have match'd his daughter with a king.
Addison.

6. To join in any way; to combine; to couple. 'A sharp wit matched with too blunt a will.'
Shak.

Match (mach), v.i. 1. To be united in marriage.

I hold it a sin to match in my kindred.
Shak.
Let tigers match with hinds, and wolves with sheep.
Dryden.

2. To be of equal size, figure, or quality; to tally; to suit; to correspond.

Match (mach), v.t. To purify, as vessels, by burning a match in them.

Matchable (mach'a-bl), a. 1. Equal; suitable; fit to be joined; fit to be placed in competition or comparison; comparable.

Sir Walter Raleigh, so far as he hath gone in the History of the World, is matchable with the best of the ancients.
Hakewill.

2. Correspondent. [Rare.]

Those at land that are not matchable with any upon our shores, are of those very kinds which are found nowhere but in the deepest parts of the sea.
Woodward.

Matchableness (mach'a-bl-nes), n. The state or quality of being matchable; correspondence. B. Jonson.

Match-boarding (mach'bórd-ing), n. A term applied to wall linings, executed in wood, in which each plank has a tongue along the edge to fit into a groove in the adjoining plank. Frequently each plank is beaded in front on the edge where the groove is, and in this case the lining is properly called matched and beaded boarding.
Brands & Coe.

Match-cloth (mach'kloth), n. A coarse woollen cloth. [American.]

Match-coat (mach'kót), n. A large loose coat made of match-cloth. [American.]

Match-cord (mach'kord), n. A line or cord prepared as a match.

Matcher (mach'ér), n. One who matches.

Matchless (mach'les), a. 1. Having no equal; unequalled; unrivalled; as, matchless impudence; matchless love or charms.

'A matchless queen.' Waller.—2. Not paired; not alike.

As she double spake, so heard she double,
With matchless ears deformed and distort.
Spenser.

Matchlessly (mach'les-ly), adv. In a matchless manner; in a degree not to be equalled.

Matchlessness (mach'les-nes), n. The state or quality of being matchless; without an equal.

Matchlock (mach'lok), n. Originally, the 1, Matchlock. 2, Lock: 3, Slit for the match.

lock of a musket, containing a match for firing; hence, a musket fired by means of a match.

Matchlockman (mach'lok-man), n. A soldier armed with a matchlock. W.H. Russell.

Match-maker (mach'mák-ér), n. One who makes matches for burning.

Match-maker (mach'mák-ér), n. One who contrives or effects a union by marriage.

Match-making (mach'mák-ing), n. The act of making matches.

Match-making (mach'mák-ing), a. Tending to make matches; eager to make matches or bring about marriages.

Mingled with these groups were three or four match-making mammals.
Dickens.

Match-plane (mach'plán), n. Either of the two planes used in joining boards by grooving and tonguing, one plane, called the plough, being used to form the groove, and the other plane to form the corresponding tongue.

Match-tub (mach'tub), n. In old war-vessels, a tub having a cover perforated with holes, in which lighted slow matches were kept inverted, and in which there was water to extinguish sparks that might fall from the match.

Mate (mát), n. [In some, perhaps all, of its meanings another form of make, a mate. See MAKE, n.; comp. also O.D. maet, D. maet, companion, mate; perhaps from same root as E. mete, to measure, Goth. mitan, to measure.] 1. One who customarily associates with another; a companion; an associate.—2. A husband or wife.

Mary took another mate.
Tennyson.

3. One of a pair of animals which associate for propagation and the care of their young.

4. A suitable companion; an equal; a match. Your pride is yet no mate for mine.
Tennyson.

5. An officer in a ship whose duty is to assist the master or commander. In a merchant ship the mate, in the absence of the master, takes command of the ship. Large ships have a first, second, and third mate.—6. In general, a subordinate officer; an assistant; as, master's mate; surgeon's mate, &c.

Mate (mát), v.t. pret. & pp. mated; ppr. matting. 1. To marry.

The hind that would be mated by the lion
Must die for love.
Shak.

2. To match one's self against; to oppose as equal; to vie with; to cope with; to equal.

For thus the mastful chestnut makes the skies.
Dryden.

Mate (mát), n. [A contr. of checkmate (which see).] In chess, the state of the king when he is in check and cannot move out of check, the position by which the player whose king is so situated loses the game.

Like a stale at chess, where it is no mate, but yet the game cannot stir.
Bacon.

Mate (mát), v.t. In chess, to checkmate (which see).

Mate (mát), v.t. [Fr. mater, to fatigue, enfeeble, from O.Fr. mat, worn out or exhausted, which is the same word as D. mat, G. matt, It. matto, Sp. Pg. mate, all from the chess term, Per. sháh mat = E. checkmate, lit. the king is dead.] To stupefy; to confound; to appeal; to enervate; to subdue; to crush. 'Not mad but mated; how, I do not know.'
Shak.

Audacity doth almost bind and mate the weaker sort of minds.
Bacon.

Twenty years of depression and continual failure mated the spirits of the cavaliers.
Hallam.

Mate (mát), v.i. To be insensate.

Mate, pp. of mate. Dejected; crushed; struck dead. Chaucer.

Maté (má'té), n. [Properly yerba de maté, maté being originally the term applied in Brazil to the vessels, usually made of gourds or calabashes, in which the herb was infused for drinking.] The Paraguay name of the Ilex paraguayensis of botanists, or Brazilian holly, whose leaves are used extensively in South America as a substitute for tea.

Mateless (mát'les), a. Having no mate or companion. 'Some mateless dove.' Peacham.

Matelote (mat'é-lót), n. [Fr., from matelot, a sailor.] A dish of food composed of many kinds of fish.

Mateology (mat'é-ol'o-jí), n. [Gr. mataios, vain, and logos, discourse.] A vain discourse or inquiry. Bailey. [Rare.]

Mateotekny (mat'é-o-tek'ni), n. [Gr. mataios, vain, and techné, art.] Any unprofitable science. [Rare.]

Mater (má'tér), n. [L.; one of those words that occur throughout the Indo-European or Aryan family. See MOTHER.] Mother. In anat. one of the two membranes that cover the cerebrum, cerebellum, medulla oblongata, and spinal cord, distinguished from each other by the epithets dura and pia. See DURA MATER, PIA MATER.—Mater aceti, mother of vinegar; a fungus or mould-plant which appears on the surface of vinegar, forming thereon a thick leather-like coat. It belongs to the genus Mycoderma.

Material (ma-té'ri-ál), a. [L. materia, material, from materia, matter. See MATTER.]

Fâte, fâr, fat, fall; mé, met, hér; pine, pin; nôte, not, môve; tûbe, tub, hÿll; oil, pound; ù, Sc. abune; ý, Sc. fey.

1. Of or pertaining to matter; consisting of matter; not spiritual; as, material substances, material bodies. 'The material elements of the universe.' Whewell.—2. Pertaining to or affecting the physical nature of man, as distinguished from the moral or religious nature, relating to the bodily wants, interests, and comforts; as, the material well-being of a person.—3. Important, momentous, more or less necessary; having influence or effect.

I shall, in the account of simple ideas, set down only such as are most material to our present purpose. Locke.

The men of the north, for the sake of material interests, seemed to be averse to treatment which their more sturdy ancestors would not have endured from an English ministry. W. Chambers.

4. In logic, pertaining to the matter of a thing and not to the form. A. Possessing sense or ideas; not empty-headed; full of matter. 'A material fool!' Shak. [Rare.] SYN. Corporeal, bodily, important, weighty, momentous, essential.

Material (ma-tê'ri-al), n. Anything composed of matter or possessing the fundamental properties of matter; the substance or matter of which anything is made, fabricated, or constructed; as, wool is the material of cloth, rags are the material of paper. The plural materials is often used in this sense; as, stones, bricks, timber, mortar, slates, &c., are the materials used in building.—Raw material, unmanufactured material; material in its natural state.

The carrier and tanner find their whole occupation in converting raw material into what may be termed prepared material. J. S. Mill.

—Strength of materials, that power by which any substance, as a rod, bar, beam, chain, or rope, resists any effort to destroy the cohesion of its parts, whether by pulling or stretching, crushing, lateral or longitudinal pressure. The inquiry into the laws by which the materials employed in the construction of edifices or machines resist the strains to which they are subjected, is a branch of mechanical science of considerable importance, because upon a just adaptation of the strength at any one point to the strain there experienced (and an excess or deficiency of the former is nearly equally injurious) depends the stability of the whole.

Material (ma-tê'ri-al), v. t. To materialize. Sir T. Browne.

Materialism (ma-tê'ri-al-izm), n. 1. The doctrine which denies the existence of any spiritual substance, and holds that the mind is mere matter, or a product of the material organization. opposed to spiritualism.

The irregular fears of a future state had been supplanted by the materialism of Epicurus. Buchanan.

2. Matter, material substances in the aggregate. [Rare.]—3. The tendency to give undue attention and care to our material nature and its wants to the neglect of our spiritual.

Materialist (ma-tê'ri-al-ist), n. One who holds the doctrine of materialism.

He who denies spirit in man or in the universe is a perfect materialist. Finney.

Materialistic, Materialistical (ma-tê'ri-al-ist'ik, ma-tê'ri-al-ist'ik-al), a. Relating to or pertaining to materialism.

But to me his very spiritualism seemed more materialistic than his physics. Kingsley.

Materiality (ma-tê'ri-al-ity), n. The quality of being material (a) material existence; corporeity; the fact of consisting of matter.

Spiritus, ever systematically consistent, pursued the doctrine to its inevitable consequence, the materiality of God. J. S. Mill.

It will be observed that Laplace's hypothesis goes entirely upon the materiality of heat, and is inconsistent with any vibratory theory. Hewell.

(b) Importance; as, the materiality of facts. Materialize (ma-tê'ri-al-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. materialized; ppr. materializing. 1. To invest with matter; to reduce to a state of matter; to make material.—2. To regard as matter, or as proceeding from or dependent on matter, to explain by the laws appropriate to matter, as, to materialize thought, ideas, life, and the like.

Materializing (ma-tê'ri-al-izing), a. Directed towards materialism.

As the perception of a spiritual Deity can only be through the mind or the spirit, the mystery might seem more profound according to this view, which, while it repudiated the materializing tendency of the former system, by its more clear and logical idealism kept up by the strong distinction between God and created things, between the human and divine mind, the all-pervading soul and the soul of man. Nathan.

Materially (ma-tê'ri-al-ly), adv. In a material manner: (a) In the state of matter. (b) Not formally; substantially.

An ill intention is certainly sufficient to spoil and corrupt an act in itself materially good. South.

(c) In an important manner or degree; essentially.

Whatever may be thought of the effect which the study of the law had upon the rights of a subject, it conducted materially to the security of good order by ascertaining the hereditary succession of the crown. Hallam.

Materialness (ma-tê'ri-al-ness), n. The state or quality of being material; importance.

Material Medicines (ma-tê'ri-a-med'i-ka), n. [L.] 1. The name given to that branch of medical science which treats of the various substances, natural and artificial, which are employed in the practice of medicine, and embraces an explanation of the nature and modes of action of those substances to which recourse is had in the cure of disease, and which are usually called medicines. Thus defined, it includes both pharmacology and therapeutics.—2. A general term for all the curative substances employed in medicine.

Material (ma-tê'ri-al), n. [L.] 1. The name given to that branch of medical science which treats of the various substances, natural and artificial, which are employed in the practice of medicine, and embraces an explanation of the nature and modes of action of those substances to which recourse is had in the cure of disease, and which are usually called medicines. Thus defined, it includes both pharmacology and therapeutics.—2. A general term for all the curative substances employed in medicine.

Materially (ma-tê'ri-al-ly), adv. In a material or motherly manner.

Maternity (ma-tê'ri-ty), n. [Fr. maternité, from L. maternus. See MATERNAL, MOTHER.] The state, character, or relation of a mother.—Maternity hospital, a hospital for the reception of women about to give birth to children.

Matfelon (mat'fel-on), n. [W. madfelon.] A plant, Onoclea nigra; knapweed.

Matgrass (mat'gras), n. A grass (Nardus stricta) which grows abundantly on moors and heaths in short tufts. It is worthless for agricultural purposes, except as a natural pasture for sheep.

Math (math), n. [A. Sax. math, math, from matian, to move. See MOW.] A mowing, or what is gathered from mowing; used chiefly in composition; as, aftermath.

The first mowing thereof, for the king's use, is wont to be sower than the common math. R. Hall.

Mathematic (ma-thê-mat'ik), n. Same as Mathematical, but less common.

Mathematical (ma-thê-mat'ik-al), a. [L. mathematicus. See MATHEMATICS.] 1. Pertaining to mathematics; as, mathematical knowledge; mathematical instruments.—2. According to the principles of mathematics; theoretically precise, very accurate; strict; rigid; as, mathematical exactness.

Mathematically (ma-thê-mat'ik-al-ly), adv. In a mathematical manner; according to the laws or principles of mathematical science, with mathematical certainty; demonstrably.

Mathematician (ma-thê-mat'ik-shan), n. [Fr. mathématicien. See MATHEMATICS.] One versed in mathematics.

Mathematics (ma-thê-mat'iks), n. [L. mathematica; Gr. mathematikê (technê, art, understood), from math, root of manthôn, mathomai, to learn.] The science that treats of the properties and relations of quantities; the science in which known relations between quantities are subjected to certain processes which enable other relations to be deduced. This science (or group of sciences) is divided into pure, which considers quantity abstractly, without relation to matter, and comprehends such branches as arithmetic, geometry, algebra, trigonometry, the differential and integral calculus, and quaternions; and mixed, which treats of magnitude as subsisting in material bodies, and is consequently interwoven with physical considerations, physical subjects being investigated and explained by mathematical reasoning. This branch comprehends mechanics, astronomy, optics, &c. These are sometimes called the physico-mathematical sciences. The science of mathematics is also distinguished into speculative and practical. In the former, the properties and relations of numbers and magnitudes are contemplated; in the latter, the knowledge of those properties and relations is applied to the solution of problems, and to a variety of practical purposes. (Names of sciences ending in ics, as mathematics, physics, metaphysics, mechanics, optics, acoustics, hermeneutics, &c., although in appearance plural, and in some cases really formed from old singulars (mathematicus, mechanicus, metaphysicus, &c.), are now generally treated as singular, and connected with singular verbs and pronouns. It is probable that the plural form was introduced to indicate the complex nature of these sciences. The Germans and French still write such words in the singular, and we also have retained a number of similar words in the singular, as, arithmetic, logic, music, rhétoric, magic, &c. The singular physics, metaphysics, &c., are also sometimes used for the more common plural forms.)

Mathemag (math'-mag), n. A fish of the cod kind, inhabiting Hudson's Bay.

Mathar (math'-er), n. Same as Madder.

Mathes (math'-es), n. An herb; a kind of chamomile.

Mathesis (ma-thê'sis), n. [Gr. mathêsis, from mathêin, 3 aor. inf. of manthân, to learn, to understand. See MATHEMATICS.] Mental discipline; learning or science in general, especially mathematics. Pope.

Matonin, Matonine (mat'-in), n. A bitter principle obtained from the plant matonin.

Matteo (ma-tê'ko), n. The Spanish name of Piper angustifolium, nat. order Piperaceae. In Peru it has long enjoyed a high reputation for its styptic properties, and it has been introduced into this country to arrest hemorrhages, to check other discharges, such as the profuse expectoration and also the night-sweats of consumptive patients. A species of Eupatorium (E. glutinosum) has the same name and similar properties. Matin (mat'-in), s. [Fr. matin; It. matina, morning, from L. matutinus, pertaining to the morning.] Pertaining to the morning; used in the morning.

Up rose the victor angels, and to arms
The matin trumpet rang. Milton.

Matin (mat'-in), s. 1. Morning.

The glow-worm shows the matin to be none,
And gives to pale his watchful fire. Shak.

2. pl. Morning worship or service; morning prayers or songs.

The vigils are celebrated before them, and the matins and matins, for the saints whose the relics are. Stillingfleet.

The winged choristers began
To chirp their matins. Clarendon.

The music and the sprightly scene
Invite us, shall we quit our road and join
These festive matins. Wordsworth.

3. pl. Time of morning service, the first canonical hour in the Romish Church.

Matinal (mat'-in-al), s. 1. Relating to the morning or to matins.—2. A term applied by Prof. H. Rogers to the third of his fifteen subdivisions of the Paleozoic strata in the Appalachian chain of North America, the names of which suggest metaphorically the different natural periods of the day; it corresponds to a certain extent with our upper Cambrian.

Matin-dog (mat'-in-dog), n. A large kind of dog, called in the Danish dog, but now scarcely seen except in France, where it is supposed to have been introduced from the north.

Matinée (mat'-in-é), n. [Fr. from matin, morning.] An entertainment or reception held early in the day.

Matra, Matara, n. Matter. Chaucer.

Matras (mat'-ras), n. [Fr. matras, a matras; also, an arrow, a javelin, from L. mater, matris, matra, a Celtic javelin, a pike, of Celtic origin; so called from its long, straight, narrow neck.] A chemical vessel in the shape of an egg, or with a tapering neck open at the top, serving the purposes of digestion, evaporation, &c.; a cucurbit. It is now superseded by the Florence flask.

Mat (mat), v.t. pret. & pp. matted; ppr. matting. 1. To cover or lay with mata.—2. To twist together; to interweave like a mat; to entangle.

And o'er his eyebrows hung his matted hair.
Dryden.

Mat (mat), v.i. To grow thick together; to become interwoven like a mat.

Mat, Matt (mat), n. (Perhaps contr. of mattier.) In copper-smelting, the alloy of copper, tin, iron, &c., otherwise called White-metal.

Matachin, n. See MATTACHIN.

Matacoo (mat'a-kō), n. The three-banded armadillo; an edentate mammal of the genus Dasypus (D. trilineatus of Linn.), remarkable for its power of rolling itself into a ball when alarmed.

Matador, Matadore (mat'a-dōr), n. [Sp., from matar, L. mactare, to kill, to sacrifice.] 1. One who kills; the killer; the man appointed to kill the bull in bull-fights. He is handsomely dressed; in his right hand he carries a naked sword, and in his left the muleta, a small stick with a piece of scarlet silk attached. When the bull is excited to fury by the annoying attacks of the picadores and banderilleros, the matador steps gravely up and plunges his sword into the animal near the left shoulder-blade, when it drops dead at his feet.—2. One of the three principal cards in the games of ombre and quadrille, which are always two black aces and the deuce in spades and clubs, and the seven in hearts and diamonds. These are termed murdering cards, because they win all others.

Matafund (mat'a-fund), n. [Sp. matar, to kill, and L. funda, a sling.] A kind of sling. 'That murderous sling the matafund.'
Southeby.

Matapata (mā-ta-mā'ta), n. A curious South American tortoise, with a small carapace and exposed head and feet. Its brown carapace is covered with pyramidal eminences, and its body is curiously fimbriated. It is the Chelys fimbriata.

Match (mach), n. [Fr. mèche, a match, Pr. mecha, It. miccia, L. and Gr. myxus, myxos, the nozzle of a lamp.] Anything that catches fire readily either from a spark or by friction, and is used for retaining, conveying, and communicating fire. Formerly, hemp, flax, cotton, or tow dipped in sulphur, coarse paper saturated with nitre, splints of wood tipped with sulphur, a species of dry wood called touchwood, were used as matches, but these have been almost entirely superseded for domestic purposes by lucifer or congrue matches, or varieties of them under the name of vesuvians, fuses, vestas, &c.—Quick match, a match made of threads of cotton, or cotton wick, steeped in gummed brandy or whisky, then soaked in a paste of meal powder and gummed spirits, and afterwards strewn over with meal powder. It burns at the rate of a yard in 13 seconds, and is used to prime heavy mortars, &c.—Slow match, a match made to burn very slowly, as at the rate of 4 or 5 inches an hour, and used for blasting purposes, artillery, &c.—To prime a match, is to prepare the match so as to be easily ignitable by putting on the end of it some wet bruised powder, made into a sort of paste.

Match (mach), n. [Another form of O.E. and Sc. make, a mate, companion, or equal; A.S. maca, gemaca, a mate, a wife. See MAKE and also MATE.] 1. A person equal or similar to another in quality; one equal to mate or cope with another; an equal; a mate; a companion.

Government . . . makes an innocent man, though of the lowest rank, a match for the mightiest of his fellow-subjects.
Addison.

2. The bringing together of two parties suited to one another, as for a union, a trial of strength or skill, a contest, or the like; specifically, (a) a competition for victory; a union of parties for contest, as in games or sports.

A solemn match was made; he lost the prize.
Dryden.

(b) Union by marriage.

Love don't seldom suffer itself to be confined by other matches than those of its own making.
Boyle.

3. One to be married; one to be gained in marriage.

She inherited a fair fortune of her own, . . . and was looked upon as the richest match of the West.
Clarendon.

Match (mach), v.t. 1. To be a match or mate for; (to be able to compete with; to equal.

No settled senses of the world can match.
The pleasure of that madness.
Shak.

2. To show an equal to; to place in competition or comparison with.

No history or antiquity can match his policies and his conduct.
South.

A monster then, a dream,
A discord. Dragons of the prime,
That take each other in their slime,
Were mellow music match'd with him.
Tennyson.

3. To oppose as equal; to set against as equal in contest.

To match with their inventions they presum'd
So easy, and of his thunder made a scorn.
Milton.

4. To suit; to make equal; to make to correspond or harmonize; to proportion. 'Matching of patterns and colours.'
Swift.

Let poets match their subject to their strength.
Roscommon.

5. To marry; to give in marriage.

A senator of Rome, while Rome surviv'd,

Matter (mat'ér), n. [O. E. mætere, maters, O. Fr. maters, Fr. matiere, from L. materia, matter, from root of mother.] 1. Body; substance extended; anything perceptible by any of the senses; that of which the whole sensible universe is composed. Matter is usually divided into three kinds or classes: solid, liquid, and aeriform or gaseous. Solid substances are those whose parts firmly cohere and resist impression, as wood or stone; liquide have free motion among their parts, and easily yield to impression, as water and wine. Aeriform or gaseous substances are elastic fluids, called vapours and gases, as air and oxygen.—2. The content of any speech or writing; the thing said; the meaning; sense; substance.

I do not much dislike the matter, but The manner of his speech. Shak.

3. In logic and metaph. that which forms the subject of any mental operation, as distinguished from the form, which is that which constitutes the nature of the operation itself, as in the act of conception all that goes to form the concept 'man,' for example, is the matter of that concept, while the mode in which the mind works to produce that concept is the form; and in the act of imagination all that is united in an imaginative representation of 'a centaur' is the matter of that act, the form being the manner in which the mind works as often as it imagines.

The term matter is usually applied to whatever is given to the artist, and consequently, as given, does not come within the province of the art itself to supply. The form is that which is given in and through the proper operation of the art. In sculpture the matter is the marble in its rough state as given to the sculptor; the form is that which the sculptor in the exercise of his art communicates to it. The distinction between matter and form in any mental operation is analogous to this. The former includes all that is given to the latter all that is given by, the operation. Denn Mansel.

4. Good sense; substance, as opposed to empty verbosity or frivolous jesting. 'To speak all mirth and no matter.' Shak.

5. Subject; thing treated; that about which we write or speak; that which employs thought or excites emotion; as, this is matter of praise, of gratitude, or of astonishment.

Hail, Son of God! Saviour of men! Thy name Shall be the copious matter of my song. Milton.

6. Affair; business; event; course of things; as, matters have succeeded well thus far; observe how matters stand; thus the matter rests at present; thus the matter ended.

To help the matter, the alchemists call in many vanities out of astrology. Bacon.

If the matter should be tried by duel between two champions, the victory should go on the one side. Bacon.

7. Cause or occasion of any event, as of any disturbance, or of a disease, or of a difficulty; obsolete except in the phrase, what is the matter?

And this is the matter why interpreters in that passage in Hosea will not consent it to be a true story, that the prophet took a harlot to wife. Milton.

8. Import; consequence; importance; moment.

A prophet some, and some a poet cry; No matter which, so neither of them lie. Dryden.

9. Thing, in a very general sense.

What impossible matter will he make easy next? Shak.

10. Indefinite amount, quantity, or portion.

I have thoughts to tarry a small matter. Congreve. Away he goes to the market-town, a matter of seven miles. Sir R. L'Estrange.

11. In printing, (a) manuscript to be set up in type; copy. (b) Type set up and ready to be used in printing.—12. (In this special sense our word corresponds with Fr. matière, D. G. materie, Sp. It. materia.) Substance excreted from living animal bodies; that which is discharged in a tumour, boil, or abscess; purulent substance collected in an abscess, the effect of suppuration more or less perfect; pus.—Matter of fact, a reality, as distinguished from what is fanciful, hypothetical, or hyperbolic.—Matter of record, that which is recorded or which may be proved by record.—Upon the matter, upon the whole matter, on the whole; taking all things into view. [Now rare.]

So that upon the matter, in a great wit, deformity is an advantage to rising. Bacon.

Waller, with Sir William Balfour, exceeded in horse, but were, upon the whole matter, equal in foot. Clarendon.

Matter (mat'ér), v. t. 1. To be of importance; to import; to signify; chiefly used in negative and interrogative phrases; as, it does not matter; what does it matter?

It matters not how they were called, so we know who they are. Locke.

2. To form pus; to collect, as matter in an abscess. [Rare.]

Each slight sore mattered it. Sidney.

Matter (mat'ér), v. t. To regard; to care for. [Rare.]

Laws my Pindaric parents mattered not. Bramston.

He did not matter cold nor hunger. Henry Brooke.

monument so called.] 1. A magnificent tomb or stately sepulchral monument.—2. In modern times, a general term applied to a sepulchral chapel or edifice erected for the reception of a monument, or to contain tombs.

Maut (mät), n. Malt. [Scotch.]

Maut (mät), n. An Egyptian goddess, the personification of Mother Nature, and the second person of the Theban trinity. She corresponds to the Greek Demeter.

Mauther (mä'thër), n. (Comp. A. Sax. maeth, E. maid.) A foolish young girl; a gawky; a wench. [Old and provincial English.]

Away, you talk like a foolish mauther. B. Jonson.

Mauve (mäv), n. (Fr., mallow, from L. malva—from its petals having purple markings.) 1. A beautiful purple dye obtained from aniline, used for dyeing silks, &c. In silk and wool the colours are permanent without the use of mordants, but cotton and calicoes require mordanting with tannin or a basic lead salt. Mauve is the sulphate of a base called mauveine.—2. The colour itself.

Mauveine (mäv'in), n. (C₂₇H₂₄N₄) The base of aniline purple or mauve.

Mavis (mä'vis), n. [Fr. mauvie, Sp. malvis, It. malvizzo, probably from the Celtic; comp. Armor. milfa, milvid, mil'hovid, a mavis; Corn. mel-huez, a lark, sweet-breath.] The Turdus musicus, throats or song-thrush of Europe, in which it inhabits every country; being permanent in Britain and spread over the three kingdoms. It haunts gardens and woods near streams and meadows. Its song is sweet and has considerable compass; it can be made to repeat musical airs, and in some instances to articulate words. This name, still common in Scotland, is now rare in England. See THRUSH.

The mavis mild wi' many a note,

Sings drowsy day to rest. Burns.

Maw (mä), n. [A. Sax. maga, D. maag, Icel. magt, O.H.G. mago, G. magen, the stomach, the belly; O.H.G. magan, to nourish.] 1. The stomach of brute: applied to the stomach of human beings in contempt only.—2. The crop of fowls.—3. Appetite; inclination.

Unless you had more maw to do me good.

Bacon, & Fl.

Maw (mä), n. An old game at cards. Methought Lucretia and I were at maw; a game, uncle, that you can well skill of. Chapman.

Maw (mä), v.t. To mow. [Scotch.]

Mawmetry (mä'met-ri), n. The religion of Mohammed; also, idolatry. 'Throwing away the rage of mawmetry.' Sir T. Herbert.

Mawmish (mä'mish), a. [Prov. E. maum, maum, soft, rotten. See MALM.] Foolish; silly; idle; nauseous. 'Nauseous mawmish mortifications.' Sir R. L'Estrange.

Mawn (mä'n), n. A basket; a maund. [Scotch.]

Maw-seed (mä'séd), n. [Maw, stomach, craw, and seed.] A name given to poppy-seed from its being used as food for cage-birds, especially when moulting.

Mawskin (mä'skin), n. The stomach of a calf prepared for making cheese; rennet. [Local.]

Mawworm (mä'wërm), n. The Ascaris vermicularis, which infests the rectum of mankind, and occasionally visits the maw or stomach.

Maxilla (maks-il'ä), n. pl. Maxillæ (maks-il'ä). [L., a jaw, dim. of malä, a jaw, from mandä, to chew.] 1. In anat. and zool. a term applied to each of the bones supporting the teeth of either jaw: in zool. often restricted to the upper jaw of the inferior vertebrates, the lower being called the mandible.—2. One of the jaws belonging to the inferior pair of horizontal jaws in articulate animals, composed of several joints, and furnished with peculiar jointed appendages called palpi or feelers.

Skull of Mustela saina (White-breasted or Beech Marten). a. Maxilla superior. b. Maxilla inferior, or mandible.

Maxillar, Maxillary (maks-il'är, maks-il'ä-ri), a. [L. maxillaris, from maxilla (which see).] Pertaining to the jaw; as, the maxillary bones or glands. In the inferior vertebrates properly restricted to the upper jaw, the term mandibular being applied to the lower.

Maxilliform (maks-il'ä-form), a. In the form of a cheek-bone.

Maxilliped (maks-il'ä-ped), n. [L. maxilla, a jaw, and pes, foot.] Jaw-foot: a term applied to the short foot-like appendages that cover the mouth in a crab, lobster, or other allied animal; they are modified locomotive limbs.

Maxim (maks'im), n. (Fr. maxime, from L. maxima (sententia, opinion, understood), the greatest or chief opinion. See MAXIMUM.) 1. An established principle; a principle generally received or admitted as true; a summary statement of an important truth, or what is regarded as such. It is a maxim in state, that all countries of new acquiesce, till settled, are rather matters of burden than strength. Bacon.

'Tis their maxim, love is love's reward. Dryden.

2. In music, the longest note formerly used, equal to two longs or four breves: a large.

—Aphorism, Axiom, Maxim, Apophthegm, Adage, Proverb, Byword, Saw. See under APHORISM.

Maximilian (maks-i-mil'i-an), n. A Bavarian gold coin worth about 13s. 6d.

Maximist (maks'im-ist), n. One who deals in maxims.

Maximization (maks-i-mi-zä'shon), n. The act or process of maximizing, or raising to the highest degree. Bentham. [Rare.]

Maximize (maks'im-iz), v.t. To make as great as possible; to increase to the highest degree. Bentham; Owen.

Maxim-monger (maks'im-mung-gér), n. One who deals much in maxims; a sententious person.

Maximum (maks-i-mum), n. [L. from maximus, greatest, superlative of magnus, great.] The greatest quantity or degree fixed, attainable, or attained, in any given case, as opposed to minimum, the smallest.

Good legislation is the art of conducting a nation to the maximum of happiness, and the minimum of misery. Colquhoun.

—Maxima and minima, in math. and physics, the greatest and least values of a variable quantity. The method of finding these greatest and least values is called the method of maxima and minima, which forms one of the most interesting inquiries in the modern analysis. Maxima and minima, however, are used to imply not the absolute greatest and least values of a varying quantity, but the values which it has at the moment when it ceases to increase and begins to decrease, and vice versa.—Maximum thermometer, a thermometer so constructed as to indicate the highest temperature during a day or during any given space of time, or since its last adjustment.

Maximum (maks-i-mum), a. Greatest; as, the maximum velocity.

May (mä), n. (Fr. mai, Fr. mai, May, from L. Maia, from the goddess Maia, a goddess of growth or increase, from root of L. magnus, great. See MAY, v. auxiliary.) 1. The fifth month of the year: sometimes used metaphorically for the early part of life.

His May of youth and bloom of lusthood. Shak.

2. Hawthorn blossom: so named because the hawthorn blooms about the end of May (old style).

But when at last I dared to speak,

The lanes, you know, were white with may.

Tennyson.

May (mä), v.i. To celebrate the festivities of May-day: used only as a participial noun in such phrases as to be a maying, to go a maying.

Life went a maying
With Nature, Hope, and Poesy when I was young.
Coleridge.

May (mä), verb auxiliary; pret. might. [A. Sax. magan, to be able, to avail, to be in health, to be sufficient; prea. 1 and 3, may; 2, meaht, mihit, pl. midgen; pret. meahte, mihite; O.Sax. magan, L.G. and D. magen, Goth. and O.H.G. magan, G. mögen, Icel. mega, Dan. maa, to be able. Akin to E. much, mickle, maid, L. magnus, Gr. megas, Skr. maha, great.] The word may denotes (a) primarily, subjective ability, or absolute possibility.

For your desire to know what is between us,

O'er-master't as you may. Shak.

That very time I saw, but thou couldst not,

Flying between the cold moon and the earth,

Cupid all armed; a certain aim he took

At a fair vestal throned by the west,

And loosed his love-shaft smartly from his bow,

As it should pierce a hundred thousand hearts;

But I might see young Cupid's fiery shaft

Quench'd in the chaste beams of the watery moon.

Shak.

For what he (the king) may do is of two kinds:

what he may do as just, and what he may do as possible.

Bacon.

[This use of the word may is now almost if not quite given up, can taking its place, and may being for the most part confined to those cases in which contingency is expressed, that is, those in which something is contemplated as possibly, but only possibly, true, or happening or about to happen, or as having possibly happened.] (b) Possibility with contingency.

A score of good ewes may be worth ten pounds.

Shak.

May be he will relent. Shak.

Immense sums have been expended on works which, if a rebellion broke out, might perish in a few hours. Macaulay.

Sometimes may is used in this way merely to avoid too great bluntness in putting a question, or to suggest doubt as to whether the person to whom the question is addressed will be able to answer it definitely.

How old may Phillips be, you ask,

Whose beauty thus all hearts engages. Prior.

Sometimes the past tense might is similarly used, with no other difference than that of imparting a certain flavour of contempt to the question.

Who might be your mother,

That you insult, exult, and all at once,

Over the wretched? Shak.

Hence, (c) Opportunity; moral power—the contingency residing in the will of some free agent.

I'll yield him thee asleep,

Where thou mayst knock a nail into his head. Shak.

(d) Permission.

An I may hide my face, let me play Thisby too. Shak.

Thou mayst be no longer steward. Luke xvi. 2.

I might not be admitted. Shak.

[In this sense may is scarcely used now in negative clauses, as permission refused amounts to an absolute prohibition, and accordingly removes all doubt or contingency.] (e) Desire, as in prayer, aspiration, imprecation, benediction, and the like.

May you live happily and long for the service of your country.

Dryden.

(f) May is frequently used to form the compound tenses of the subjunctive mood. Nearly all the examples of this kind might be referred to the head (b), for the word may in such cases can seldom be held to express more than contingency, although it may occur in clauses in which the context or the conjunction that introduces the clause indicates that something additional, as a concession, or a purpose, is expressed. May is so used (i) in substantive clauses, or clauses that take the place of or are in apposition with the subject or object or predicate of a sentence: introduced by that.

It was my secret wish that he might be prevailed on to accompany me. Byron.

They apprehended that he might have been carried off by gipsies. Southey.

(g) In conditional clauses. [Rare, except in clauses where permission is distinctly expressed.]

Lands, goods, horse, armour, anything I have is his to use, so Somerset may die. Shak.

(h) In concessive clauses.

Whatever the stars may have bestowed, this August,

1749, was a momentous month to Germany.

G. H. Lewes.

(i) In clauses expressing a purpose.

Constantius had separated his forces that he might divide the attention and resistance of the enemy.

Gibbon.

May (mä), n. [A. Sax. maeg, a maid, a woman.

times impregnated with carbonic acid gas. [United States.]

Mead (méd), n. Same as Meadow; chiefly used in poetry. 'The flowery meads of May.' Wither.

Meadow (me'dô), n. [A. Sax. maðu, mæðewe, a meadow, shorter form mæd, a mead; perhaps allied to math (after math) and mow.] A low, level tract of land under grass, and generally mown annually or oftener for hay; a piece of grassland in general. Meadows are often on the banks of a river or lake, but so far above the surface as to be dry enough to produce grass and herbage of a superior quality. In America, the word is applied particularly to the low ground on the banks of rivers, consisting of a rich mould or an alluvial soil, whether grassland, pasture, tillage, or woodland.

Meadow (me'dô), a. Belonging to or growing in a meadow; as, meadow flowers; meadow grass.

Meaking-iron (mêk'îng-lérn), n. Naut. A tool used by caulkers to run old oakum out of the seams of ships before inserting new.

Meal (mêl), n. [A. Sax. mael, time, portion, repeat; D. and Dan. maal, G. mahl, Icel. mál, a part, repeat, measure, time; Goth. mêl, time, occasion. The original meaning may have been a 'portion measured,' from root seen in measure, mete. It is the termination seen in piecemeal, limbmeal, parcelmeal=A. Sax. -malum, the dative plural used adverbially.] A portion of food taken at one of the regular times for eating; occasion of taking food; a repeat. 'Great meals of beef.' Shak.

Unquiet meals make ill digestions. Shak.

What strange fish
Hath made his meal on thee? Shak.

Meal (mêl), n. [A. Sax. melu, melo, meolo, G. mehl, Icel. Sw. mjöl, D. Dan. meel, meal; lit. what is ground, from the verbal stem seen in Icel. mala, Goth. malan, G. mahlen, L. molo, to grind. See MELLOW.] The edible part of wheat, oats, rye, barley, pease, and pulse of different kinds, ground into a species of flour.

Meal (mêl), v.t. 1. To grind into meal; to pulverize; as, mealed powder.—2. To sprinkle with meal, or to mix meal with. [Rare.] Meal (mêl), v.t. [Perhaps from A. Sax. mael, a mark, a spot.] To defile; to taint.

Were he meal'd with that
Which he corrects, then were he tyrannous. Shak.

Meal-ark (mêl'ârk), n. A large chest for holding meal. [Scottch.]

A whiggish mob . . . plundered his dwelling-place of four silver spoons, intruding also with his mart and his meal-ark. Sir W. Scott.

Meal-beetle (mêl'bê-tî), n. A coleopterous insect belonging to the genus Tenebrio, whose larva is the meal-worm. See MEAL-WORM.

Meal-tub (mêl'tub), n. A large tub or barrel for holding meal or flour.

Meal-worm (mêl'wôrm), n. The larva of a coleopterous insect of the genus Tenebrio (T. molitor), which infests granaries, corn-mills, bake-houses, &c., and is very injurious to flour, meal, and the like.

Mealy (mêl'î), a. 1. Having the qualities of meal, or resembling meal in any of its qualities; as, a mealy powder; a mealy potato; a mealy apple.—2. Overspread with something that resembles meal; as, the mealy wings of an insect.—3. Mealy-mouthed. [Vulgar or slang.]

I didn't mince the matter with him. I'm never mealy with 'em. Dickens.

—Mealy bug, a species of Coccus (C. adonidum), covered with a white powdery substance. It is often found on the trunks of vines and other hothouse plants.

Mealy-mouthed (mêl'mouvé), a. Unwilling to tell the truth in plain language; inclined to speak of anything in softer terms than the truth will warrant.

Not a mealy-mouthed man! A candid ferocity, if the case call for it, is in him (Mahomet); he does not mince matters. Carlyle.

Mealy-mouthedness (mêl'mouvé-nés), n. The quality of being mealy-mouthed.

Mean (mén), a. [A. Sax. mane, mean, false, bad, gemane, common; Icel. meini, mean, base; D. and Dan. gemeen, mean, base, common, Goth. gamaina, G. gemein, common.] 1. Wanting dignity; low in rank or birth; common; low; vulgar; humble; as, a man of mean parentage, mean birth or origin.

Called from his mean abode his sceptre to sustain. Dryden.

2. Wanting dignity of mind; low-minded; base; destitute of honour; spiritless.

Can you imagine I so mean could prove,
To save my life by changing of my love? Dryden.

3. Of little value or account; low in worth or estimation; worthy of little or no regard; contemptible; despicable.

We fast, not to please men, nor to promote any mean worldly interest. Sp. Smalridge.

The Roman legions and great Cæsar found
Our fathers no mean foes. J. Philips.

SYN. Ignoble, humble, poor, abject, beggarly, wretched, base, degraded, degenerate, vulgar, vile, servile, menial, spiritless, grovelling, slavish, dishonourable, disgraceful, shameful, despicable, contemptible, paltry, sordid, penurious, niggardly.

Mean (mén), a. [O. Fr. meien, moien, Fr. moyen, Pr. meian, from L. mediānus, middle, from medius, middle.] 1. Occupying a middle position; without excess; middle; moderate; intermediate.

One of the properest and best-graced men that ever I saw, being of middle age and a mean stature. Sir P. Sidney.

According to the fittest style of lofty, mean, or lowly. Milton.

2. In math. having an intermediate value between two extremes, or between the several successive values of a variable quantity during one cycle of variation; as, mean distance; mean motion; mean solar day. Mean proportional is the second of any three quantities in continued proportion. Extreme and mean proportion is when a line or any quantity is so divided that the less part is to the greater as the greater is to the whole.—Mean sun, in astron. an imaginary sun, supposed to describe the equator with an equal motion in the same period in which the real sun appears to describe the ecliptic with an unequal motion. The time in which an imaginary sun so moving in the equator would perform one of its apparent diurnal revolutions is called a mean solar day, and true or mean time is that which would be indicated by an imaginary sun moving as above supposed, and mean noon the time in which such a sun would be on the meridian. True or mean time is also indicated by a time-keeper regulated to go twenty-four hours in a mean solar day, and mean noon the instant when such a time-keeper indicates twelve o'clock. See DAY.—Mean moon, an imaginary moon, supposed to move with an equal motion in the equator or ecliptic as required, and in the same period as that in which the real moon performs a revolution in her orbit with an unequal motion.—Mean noon. See under Mean Sun.—Mean distance of a planet from the sun, an arithmetical mean between its greatest and least distances.—Mean motion, mean time, mean day. See MOTION, TIME, DAY.—Mean clef, in music, the C clef; the clef on which music for alto and tenor parts (intermediate between the outer parts treble and bass) was written. It is not now nearly so much used as formerly.

Mean (mén), n. 1. That which is intermediate between two extremes; the middle point or place; the middle rate or degree; absence of extremes or excess; mediocrity; medium; moderation.

There is a mean in all things. Dryden.

But no authority of gods or men
Allow of any mean in poetry. Racine.

2. In math. a quantity having an intermediate value between several others from which it is derived, and of which it expresses the resultant value; usually, the simple average formed by adding the quantities together and dividing by their number, which is called an arithmetical mean. A geometrical mean is the square root of the product of the quantities. When a geometrical proportion consists of four terms the two middle terms are called the means or mean terms, and their product is equal to the product of the extremes. The harmonic mean between two quantities is a quantity which is double a fourth proportional to the sum of the two quantities and the quantities themselves:

Fâte, far, fat, fâil; mê, met, hér; pine, pin; nôte, not, môve; tûbe, tub, bûll; oil, pound; û, Sc. abune; ý, Sc. feg.

then, if a and b be the two quantities,
 $a+b : a :: b : a+b$, the fourth proportional;
 and $\frac{a+b}{2}$ is therefore the harmonical mean.
 2. Intervening time; interval of time; intervalum; meantime.

And in the mean vouchsafe her handsome tomb.
Spenser.
 4. In music, an intermediate voice or part;
 the tenor or alto. 'A mean or tenor is the sweetest.' Bacon.

The base and treble married to the mean. Drayton.
 5. That which is used to effect an object; the medium through which something is done; measure or measures adopted, agency;
 instrumentality.

As long as that which Christians did was good, their virtuous conversation was a means to work
 the heathen's conversion unto Christ. Hooker.
 In this sense means, in the plural, is generally used, and often with a singular attribute or predication.

By this means he had them the more at vantage.
Bacon.

A good character, when established, should not be rooted in as an end, but only employed as a means of doing still further good. Hervey.

6. pl. Income, revenue, resources, substance, or estate; disposable force or substance.
 Your means are very slender, and your waste is great. Shak.

—By all means, certainly; on every consideration;
 without fail; as, go, by all means. —
 By no means, not at all; certainly not; not in any degree.

The wise on this side of the lake is by no means as good as that on the other. Addison.

—By no means of means, by no means; not the least. —By any means, possibly; at all.

If by any means I might obtain unto the resurrection of the dead. Phil. iii. 11.

Mean (mēn), v. t. pret. & pp. meant; ppe.

 The quality of being measurable or admitting of mensuration.

Measurably (mēz'ar-a-bil-ly), adv. In a measurable manner: (a) in such a manner as can be measured. (b) Moderately; in a limited degree.

Yet do it measurably, as it becometh Christians.
Lentulus.

Measure (mēz'ar), n. [Fr. mesure; L. me-sura, from metri, metrus, to measure; allied to Gr. metron, a measure; from an Indo-European root me, to measure, from which come also moon, month, L. mensis, and Skr. masa, a month.] 1. The extent of a thing in any one or more of the three dimensions, length, breadth, and thickness, in circumference, capacity, or in any other respect.

The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea. Job xl. 9.

2. The whole number of measurements required by a tradesman in order to make an article of dress, as, to take one's measures for a coat or a pair of boots. — 3. A standard of measurement; a fixed unit of capacity or extent, a definite amount, fixed by law or custom, in terms of which the size or capacity of anything is ascertained and expressed; as, a yard is a measure of length, a gallon a measure of capacity, a square foot a measure of area.

For law we have a measure, know what to trust to; equity is according to the conscience of him that is Chancellor; and as that is larger or narrower, so is equity. Selden.

4. The instrument by which extent or capacity is ascertained; a measuring rod or line; as, he carries his measure in his pocket; a foot-rule is his measure.—5. A limited or definite quantity; as, a measure of wine or beer. 'Be large in mirth; anon we'll drink a measure.' Shak.—6. Determined extent or length; limit.

Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days. Ps. xxxix. 4.

If else thou seek'st
Aught not surpassing human measure, say, Milton.

7. That which is measured, allotted, or dealt out to one; as, to give one good measure or hard measure.—8. Full or sufficient quantity. [Rare.]

I'll never pause again, never stand still,
Till either death hath closed these eyes of mine,
Or fortune given me measure of revenge. Shak.

9. Moderation; just degree: common in such phrases as, beyond measure, within measure, &c.

There is measure in everything. Shak.

10. Degree; indefinite quantity.

I have laid down, in some measure, the description of the old world. Abp. Abbot.

There is a great measure of discretion to be used in the performance of confession. Fer. Taylor.

11. Means to an end; anything done with a view to the accomplishment of an ulterior purpose; as, a wise measure; rash measures, &c. [This use of the word, though found both in Milton and Clarendon, and now very common, does not occur once in Shakspeare. It seems to have originated in the phrase to take measures, in the sense of to estimate the magnitude of the object to be achieved, with the view of determining what means will be required to accomplish it.]—12. In music, (a) that division by which the motion of music, or the time of dwelling on each note, is regulated. (b) Same as Time in music.—13. In poetry, the arrangement of the syllables in each line with respect to quantity or accent; metre; rhythm; as, hexameter measure; iambic decasyllabic measure.—14. Any regulated or graceful motion, especially motion adjusted to musical time; a grave solemn dance, with slow and measured steps, like the minuet.

Where is the horse that doth untread again
His tedious measures with the untamed fire
That he did pace them first? Shak.

Hath not my gail in it the measure of the court? Shak.

Now tread we a measure! said young Lochinvar. By W. Scott.

15. pl. In geol. beds; strata: used solely or almost solely in the phrase, coal-measures.

Measure of a number or quantity. In math. a number or quantity is said to be a measure of another when the former is contained in the latter a certain number of times exactly.—Greatest common measure of two or more numbers or quantities, the greatest number or quantity which divides them all without a remainder.—Measure of a ratio, its logarithm in any system of logarithms; or the exponent of the power to which the ratio is equal, the exponent of some given ratio being assumed as unity. See RATIO.—Standards of measure. (See definition 3.) In this country the unit of linear measure is the yard, all other denominations being either multiples or aliquot parts of the yard. The length of the imperial standard yard, according to an act of parliament passed in 1824, was the straight line or distance between the centres of the two points in the gold studs in the brass rod in the custody of the clerk of the House of Commons, entitled, standard yard, 1760.

By the same act, the brass rod, when used, must be at the temperature of 62° of Fahrenheit's thermometer. It was enacted at the same time that if this standard should be lost or destroyed, the length of the yard should be determined by reference to the length of a pendulum vibrating seconds of mean time in a vacuum in the latitude of London, at sea-level. When the standard yard was actually destroyed, however, by the fire which consumed the two Houses of Parliament in 1834, the commissioners appointed to restore the standard decided that it was better to do so by means of authentic copies of the old standard. This was accordingly done, and five official copies were made, one of which, the national standard, is preserved at the exchequer in a stone coffin in a window-seat of a gabled room, one immured in a wall of the lower waiting-room of the House of Commons; one preserved in a bullion-room at the mint; one at the royal observatory, Greenwich, and one intrusted to the Royal Society. The national standard is the distance between two fine transverse lines on a square rod of gun-metal 38 inches long. In France the mètre is the standard or unit of linear measure; the are, or 100 square mètres, the unit of surface measure; and the stère, or cube of a mètre, the unit of solid measure. The system of measure, called the decimal or metric system, based upon these standards, is now largely adopted. See under METRIC.—Standard measure of capacity. For all sorts of liquids, corn, and dry goods, the standard measure is declared by the act of 1824 to be the imperial gallon, which should contain 10 lbs. avoirdupois weight of distilled water weighed in air at the temperature of 62° Fahr. the barometer being at 30 inches. The official measurement of this quantity of water measured under the specified conditions gave as the result 277.274 cubic inches, which, though since ascertained to be slightly in excess of the true measurement (277.123 cubic inches), is still the legal capacity of the gallon. Linear or long measure, measure of length; the measure of lines or distances.—Liquid measure, the measure of liquids.—Square measure, the measure of surfaces, expressed in square yards or any other square unit of length.—To take the measure of, to observe narrowly so as to form a judgment concerning.

Measure (mez'hûr), v. t. pret. & pp. measured; ppr. measuring. 1. To compute or ascertain the extent, quantity, dimensions, or capacity of, by a certain rule or standard; as, to measure land; to measure distance; to measure the altitude of a mountain; to measure the capacity of a ship or of a cask; to measure the degree of heat or moisture. 2. To serve as the measure of; to be adequate to express the size of.

An ell and three quarters will not measure her from hip to hip. Shak.

3. To estimate by an inexact standard; to guess the magnitude of by the unassisted senses; to judge of the greatness of; to appreciate; to value.

If I be measured rightly,
Your majesty hath no just cause to hate me. Shak.

Great are thy works, Jehovah! infinite
Thy power! what thought can measure thee. Milton.

4. To pass through or over.

We must measure twenty miles to-day. Shak.

The vessel ploughs the sea,
And measures back with speed her former way. Dryden.

5. To adjust; to proportion.

To secure a contented spirit, measure your desires by your fortunes, not your fortunes by your desires. Fer. Taylor.

6. To allot or distribute by measure: in this sense often with out.

With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. Mat. vii. 2.

—To measure one's (own) length, to lie, fall, or be thrown down.

If you will measure your lubber's length again, tarry; but away! Shak.

—To measure strength, to ascertain by trial which of two parties is the stronger; specifically, to engage in a contest.

The two parties were still regarding each other with cautious hostility, and had not yet measured their strength, when news arrived which inflamed the passions and confirmed the opinions of both. Macaulay.

—To measure swords, to fight with swords.

Measure (mez'hûr), v. t. 1. To take a measurement or measurements.—2. To result or turn out on being measured; as, you will find it will measure well.—3. To be in extent; as, cloth measures three-fourths of a yard; a tree measures threefeet in diameter. [The terms expressing the measurement are in the objective absolute, or more correctly speaking in the accusative of extent.]

Measured (mez'hûr), p. and a. 1. Computed or ascertained by a rule; adjusted; proportioned; passed over.—2. Deliberate and uniform; slow and steady; stately; formal; as, he walked with measured steps.

3. Limited or restricted; within bounds; moderate; as, in no measured terms.

Measureless (mez'hûr-les), a. Without measure; unlimited; immeasurable. 'Measureless content.' Shak.

And most of all would I flee from the cruel madness of love.

Measurement (mez'hûr-men), n. 1. The act of measuring; mensuration.—2. The amount ascertained by measuring; the bulk; size; area or content.—Measurement goods, light goods which are charged for carriage by the bulk of the packages, as distinguished from heavy goods which are charged by weight.

Measurer (mez'hûr-er), n. One who or that which measures; specifically, (a) one whose occupation or duty is to measure commodities in market; (b) one who measures work on a building as a basis for contractors' prices. (c) An officer in the city of London, who measured woollen cloths, coals, &c. Called also a Meter. See ALNAGER.

Measuring (mez'hûr-ing), p. and a. 1. Computing or ascertaining length, dimensions, capacity, or amount.—2. Used in measuring; as, a measuring rod or line.—A measuring cast, a cast or throw in a game that requires to be measured, or that cannot be distinguished from another but by measuring.

When lusty shepherds throw
The bar by turns, and none the rest outgo
So far, but that the best are measuring casts,
Their emulation and their pastime lasts. Walter.

Meat (mêt), n. [A Sax. mete, mate, O. Fris. mele, mêt, Icel. matr, mat, Dan. mad, Sw. mat, Goth. mat, food; farther connections doubtful.] 1. Food in general; anything eaten or fit for eating as nourishment, either by man or beast.

And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb . . . to you it shall be for meat. Gen. i. 29.

Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you. Gen. ix. 3.

Shall I not take care of all that I think,
Yea, ev'n of wretched meat and drink? Tennyson.

2. The flesh of animals used as food; as, the meat of carnivorous animals is tough, coarse, and ill-favoured; the meat of herbivorous animals is generally palatable.—3. The edible portion of something; as, the meat of an egg.—To sit at meat, to sit or recline at the table.

Meat (mêt), v. t. To supply with meat or food; to feed. [Old English and Scotch.]

Meatal (mê-s'tal), a. Of or belonging to a meatus; having the character of a meatus.

In the hare the meatal part of the tympanic is long and ascends obliquely backward from the frame of the drum-membrane. Owen.

Meat-biscuit (mêt'ble-ke), n. A concentrated preparation of the most nutritious parts of meat, pounded and mixed with meal, and baked in the form of a biscuit, used in long voyages, travels, &c.

Meated (mêt'ed), a. Fed; fattened.

Strong oxen and horses, well shod and well clad,
Well meated and used. Tusser.

Meat-fly (mêt'fî), n. A fly which deposits its eggs on meat; particularly the Musca vomitoria, a blue-bodied species, which abounds in the summer.

Meath (mêth), n. [See MEAD.] Liquor or drink obtained from fruit.

For drink the grape
She crushes, inoffensive must, and meath. Milton.

Meatiness (mêt'i-nes), n. The state or quality of being meaty; fleshiness.

Meatless (mêt'les), a. Destitute of meat.

Meat-offering (mêt'ôf-er-ing), n. An offering or sacrifice consisting of meat or food, or more strictly of nothing but flour and oil. The law or ceremonial of the Jewish meat-offering is described in Lev. ii. and vi.

Meat-pie (mêt'pi), n. A pie made of meat or flesh.

Meat-salesman (mêt'sâlz-man), n. One who sells meat; specifically, an agent in town who receives carcases from cattle-raisers for sale, and disposes of them to retail butchers.

Meat-screen (mêt'skrên), n. A metal screen placed behind meat while roasting, to reflect the heat of the fire.

Meatus (mê-â'tus), n. [L., from meo, to go.] A passage: a term applied in anatomy to various ducts and passages of the body; as, the meatus auditorius, the passage of the ear; meatus ophthalmicus, the gall-duct.

Meaty (mêt'i), a. Abounding in meat; fleshy, but not fat; resembling meat; as, a meaty flavour.

Meaw, Meaw! (mû, mûl). See MEW, MEWL.

Mechanic (mek'nik), n. Same as Mechanics.
Mechanic (mek'nik), v. t. To fall in very fine drops, as of rain. See METAL, METAL.

The air beats more moist when the water is in small than in great drops, in descending and cutting rain, than in great showers. Arctian

Mechanic, a. pl. [Fr meubles] Moveable goods. Chaucer

Mechanic (mek'nik), n. 1. One skilled or employed in shaping and setting materials, as wood, metal, etc. into any kind of structure, machine, or other object, an artisan, an artificer, one who follows a mechanical occupation for his living, a term somewhat loosely applied, but always including agricultural labourers, or labourers who work with pick, shovel, spade, or similar tools, and sometimes restricted to those employed in making and repairing machinery. — Mechanic (mek'nik), an institution for the instruction and recreation of persons of the lower and artisan classes, by means of lectures, a library museum, courses of lessons, etc. — St. Arthur, artisan, operative.

Mechanic (mek'nik), a. Same as Mechanics, but not so commonly or widely applied. In the following quotations it is used in the sense noted under Mechanics.
 With groupy aprons, robes, and hennins. Shak
 To make a quilt, a bore, or a bag.
 Dressed to a mechanic's dialect. Barrowman.

Mechanics (mek'nik), n. 1. Construction, or mechanism, from mekhano, a machine. 1. Pertaining to or in accordance with the principles or laws of mechanics, depending upon mechanism or machinery, as, a mechanical contrivance. 2. Resembling a machine, as (a) acting without thought or independence of judgment and of persons, as, he was a mechanical follower of the precepts of his master. (b) Done as if by a machine, that is, without deliberate design, but by the mere force of habit, or characterized by slavish and unthinking obedience to rule or external guidance, as, he made a mechanical movement with his hand, the artist's work betrayed a mechanical style of drawing. 3. Pertaining to artisans or mechanics or their employments. Hence: 4. In disparagement, of mean occupation, base, rude, mean, vulgar, servile. — base and mechanical migration. Holland.

Hang him, mechanical anti-butter cups! Shak
 See also quotations under Mechanics. — Acting by or resulting from weight or momentum, as, mechanical pressure. 5. Pertaining to those changes of position in which they form compounds without losing their identity in the compound substance as opposed to chemical, as, a mechanical mixture, mechanical decomposition. — Mechanical philosophy, is that which explains the phenomena of nature and the operations of corporeal things on the principles of mechanics, viz. the motion, gravity, figure, arrangement, disposition, greatness, or smallness of the parts which compose natural bodies. — Mechanical power, the simple instruments or elements of which every machine, however complicated must be constructed, they are the lever, the wheel and axle, the pulley, the inclined plane, the wedge, and the screw. — Mechanical solution of a problem, a solution by any art or contrivance not strictly geometrical, as by means of the ruler and compass or other instruments. — Mechanical theory is that that system by which all diseases were attributed principally to lesser or morbid fluidity of the blood. — Roots of mechanical organs, in good rocks composed of sand, pebbles, fragments, and the like, mechanically united, as distinguished from them which have a regular crystalline texture. — Mechanical curve a curve of such a nature that the relation between the abscissa and the ordinate cannot be expressed by an algebraic equation. Such curves are now generally called transcendental curves. — Mechanical changes. These terms are thus distinguished those changes which bodies undergo without altering their constitution, that is, losing their identity, such as changes of place, of figure, etc. are mechanical, those which alter the constitution of bodies, making them different substances, as when flour, yeast, and water unite to form bread, are chemical. In the one case the changes relate to matters of matter, as the motions of the heavenly bodies, or the action of the wind on a ship under sail; in the other case, the changes occur between the particles of matter, as the action of heat in melting lead, or the union of acid and lime forming mortar. Most of what are usually called the mechanic arts are partly mechanical and partly chemical.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanography (mek'no-gra'fi), n. [Or, mekano, a machine, and grapho, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

pressed; as, a yard is a measure of length, a gallon a measure of capacity, a square foot a measure of area.

For law we have a measure, know what to trust to; equity is according to the conscience of him that is Chancellor; and as that is larger or narrower, so is equity. Selden.

4. The instrument by which extent or capacity is ascertained; a measuring rod or line; as, he carries his measure in his pocket; a foot-rule is his measure.—5. A limited or definite quantity; as, a measure of wine or beer. 'Be large in mirth; anon we'll drink a measure.' Shak.—6. Determined extent or length; limit.

Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days. Ps. xxxix. 4.

If else thou seek'st
Aught not surpassing human measure, say, Milton.
7. That which is measured, allotted, or dealt out to one; as, to give one good measure or hard measure.—8. Full or sufficient quantity. [Rare.]

I'll never pause again, never stand still,
Till either death hath closed these eyes of mine,
Or fortune given me measure of revenge. Shak.

9. Moderation; just degree; common in such phrases as, beyond measure, within measure, &c.

There is measure in everything. Shak.
10. Degree; indefinite quantity.

I have laid down, in some measure, the description of the old world. Asp. Abbot.

There is a great measure of discretion to be used in the performance of confession. Jer. Taylor.

11. Means to an end; anything done with a view to the accomplishment of an ulterior purpose; as, a wise measure; rash measures, &c. [This use of the word, though found both in Milton and Clarendon, and now very common, does not occur once in Shakspeare. It seems to have originated in the phrase to take measures, in the sense of to estimate the magnitude of the object to be achieved, with the view of determining what means will be required to accomplish it.]—12. In music, (a) that division by which the motion of music, or the time of dwelling on each note, is regulated. (b) Same as Time in music.—13. In poetry, the arrangement of the syllables in each line with respect to quantity or accent; metre; rhythm; as, hexameter measure; iambic decasyllabic measure.—14. Any regulated or graceful motion, especially motion adjusted to musical time; a grave solemn dance, with slow and measured steps, like the minuet.

Where is the horse that doth untried again
His tedious measures with the unbrated fire
That he did pace them first? Shak.

Hath not my gait in it the measure of the court?
Shak.

Now tread we a measure! said young Lochinvar.
Sir W. Scott.

15. pl. In geol. beds; strata: used solely or almost solely in the phrase, coal-measures.—Measure of a number or quantity, in math. a number or quantity is said to be a measure of another when the former is contained in the latter a certain number of times exactly.—Greatest common measure of two or more numbers or quantities, the greatest number or quantity which divides them all without a remainder.—Measure of a ratio, its logarithm in any system of logarithms; or the exponent of the power to which the ratio is equal, the exponent of some given ratio being assumed as unity. See RATIO.—Standards of measure. (See definition 3.) In this country the unit of lineal measure is the yard, all other denominations being either multiples or aliquot parts of the yard. The length of the imperial standard yard, according to an act of parliament passed in 1824, was the straight line or distance between the centres of the two points in the gold studs in the brass rod in the custody of the clerk of the House of Commons, entitled, standard yard, 1780.

By the same act, the brass rod, when used, must be at the temperature of 62° of Fahrenheit's thermometer. It was enacted at the same time that if this standard should be lost or destroyed, the length of the yard should be determined by reference to the length of a pendulum vibrating seconds of mean time in a vacuum in the latitude of London, at sea-level. When the standard yard was actually destroyed, however, by the fire which consumed the two Houses of Parliament in 1834, the commissioners appointed to restore the standard decided that it was better to do so by means of authentic copies of the old standard. This was accordingly done, and five official copies were made, one of which, the national standard, is preserved at the exchequer in a stone coffin in a window-seat of a groined room; one immured in a wall of the lower waiting-room of the House of Commons; one preserved in a bullion-room at the mint; one at the royal observatory, Greenwich, and one intrusted to the Royal Society. The national standard is the distance between two fine transverse lines on a square rod of gun-metal 38 inches long. In France the mètre is the standard or unit of linear measure; the are, or 100 square mètres, the unit of surface measure; and the stère, or cube of a mètre, the unit of solid measure. The system of measure, called the decimal or metric system, based upon these standards, is now largely adopted. See under METRIC.—Standard measure of capacity. For all sorts of liquids, corn, and dry goods, the standard measure is declared by the act of 1824 to be the imperial gallon, which should contain 10 lbs. avoirdupois weight of distilled water weighed in air at the temperature of 62° Fahr., the barometer being at 30 inches. The official measurement of this quantity of water measured under the specified conditions gave as the result 277.274 cubic inches, which, though since ascertained to be slightly in excess of the true measurement (277.125 cubic inches), is still the legal capacity of the gallon.—Lineal or long measure, measure of length; the measure of lines or distances.—Liquid measure, the measure of liquors.—Square measure, the measure of surfaces, expressed in square yards or any other square unit of length.—To take the measure of, to observe narrowly so as to form a judgment concerning.

Measure (mez'h'ür), v.t. pret. & pp. measured; ppr. measuring. 1. To compute or ascertain the extent, quantity, dimensions, or capacity of, by a certain rule or standard; as, to measure land; to measure distance; to measure the altitude of a mountain; to measure the capacity of a ship or of a cask; to measure the degree of heat or moisture. 2. To serve as the measure of; to be adequate to express the size of.

An ell and three quarters will not measure her from hip to hip. Shak.

3. To estimate by an inexact standard; to guess the magnitude of by the unassisted senses; to judge of the greatness of; to appreciate; to value.

If I be measured rightly,
Your majesty hath no just cause to hate me. Shak.

Great are thy works, Jehovah! infinite
Thy power! what thought can measure thee. Milton.

4. To pass through or over.

We must measure twenty miles to-day. Shak.
The vessel ploughs the sea,
And measures back with speed her former way. Dryden.

5. To adjust; to proportion.

To secure a contented spirit, measure your desires by your fortunes, not your fortunes by your desires. Jer. Taylor.

6. To allot or distribute by measure: in this sense often with out.

With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. Mat. vii. 2.

—To measure one's (own) length, to lie, fall, or be thrown down.

If you will measure your lubber's length again, tarry: but away! Shak.

—To measure strength, to ascertain by trial which of two parties is the stronger; specifically, to engage in a contest.

The two parties were still regarding each other with cautious hostility, and had not yet measured their strength, when news arrived which inflamed the passions and confirmed the opinions of both. Macaulay.

—To measure swords, to fight with swords.

Measure (mez'h'ür), v.i. 1. To take a measurement or measurements.—2. To result or turn out on being measured; as, you will find it will measure well.—3. To be in extent; as, cloth measures three-fourths of a yard; a tree measures three feet in diameter. [The terms expressing the measurement are in the objective absolute, or more correctly speaking in the accusative of extent.]

Measured (mez'h'ürd), p. and a. 1. Computed or ascertained by a rule; adjusted; proportioned; passed over.—2. Deliberate and uniform; slow and steady; stately; formal; as, he walked with measured steps. 3. Limited or restricted; within bounds; moderate; as, in no measured terms.

Measureless (mez'h'ür-less), a. Without measure; unlimited; immeasurable. 'Measureless content.' Shak.

And most of all would I flee from the cruel madness of love.
The honey of poison-flowers, and all the measureless ill. Tennyson.

Measurement (mez'h'ür-ment), n. 1. The act of measuring; mensuration.—2. The amount ascertained by measuring; the bulk; size; area or content.—Measurement goods, light goods which are charged for carriage by the bulk of the packages, as distinguished from heavy goods which are charged by weight.

Measurer (mez'h'ür-ér), n. One who or that which measures; specifically, (a) one whose occupation or duty is to measure commodities in market; (b) one who measures work on a building as a basis for contractors' prices. (c) An officer in the city of London, who measured woollen cloths, coals, &c. Called also a Meter. See ALNAGER.

Measuring (mez'h'ür-ing), p. and a. 1. Computing or ascertaining length, dimensions, capacity, or amount.—2. Used in measuring; as, a measuring rod or line.—A measuring cast, a cast or throw in a game that requires to be measured, or that cannot be distinguished from another but by measuring.

When lusty shepherds throw
The bar by turns, and none the rest outgo
So far, but that the best are measuring casts,
Their emulation and their pasture lasts. Walter.

Meat (mêt), n. [A. Sax. mete, mette, O. Fris. mete, mêt, Icel. metr, mata, Dan. mad, Sw. mat, Goth. maia, food; farther connections doubtful.] 1. Food in general; anything eaten or fit for eating as nourishment, either by man or beast.

And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb . . . to you it shall be for meat. Gen. i. 29.
Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you. Gen. ix. 3.

Shall I not take care of all that I think,
Yea, ev'n of wretched meat and drink? Tennyson.

2. The flesh of animals used as food; as, the meat of carnivorous animals is tough, coarse, and ill-favoured; the meat of herbivorous animals is generally palatable.—3. The edible portion of something; as, the meat of an egg.—To sit at meat, to sit or recline at the table.

Meat (mêt), v.t. To supply with meat or food; to feed. [Old English and Scotch.]

Meatal (mê-s'tal), a. Of or belonging to a meatus; having the character of a meatus.

In the hare the meatal part of the tympanic is long and ascends obliquely backward from the frame of the drum-membrane. Owen.

Meat-biscuit (mêt'bis-ket), n. A concentrated preparation of the most nutritious parts of meat, pounded and mixed with meal, and baked in the form of a biscuit, used in long voyages, travels, &c.

Meated (mêt'ed), a. Fed; fattened.

Strong oxen and horses, well shod and well chad,
Well meated and used. Tusser.

Meat-fly (mêt'flī), n. A fly which deposits its eggs on meat; particularly the Musca vomitoria, a blue-bodied species, which abounds in the summer.

Meath (mêth), n. [See MEAD.] Liquor or drink obtained from fruit.

For drink the grape
She crushes, inoffensive must, and meaths
From many a berry. Milton.

Meatiness (mêt'ī-nes), n. The state or quality of being meaty; fleshiness.

Meatless (mêt'les), a. Destitute of meat.

Meat-offering (mêt'of-ér-ing), n. An offering or sacrifice consisting of meat or food, or more strictly of nothing but flour and oil. The law or ceremonial of the Jewish meat-offering is described in Lev. ii. and vi.

Meat-pie (mêt'pi), n. A pie made of meat or flesh.

Meat-salesman (mêt'salz-man), n. One who sells meat; specifically, an agent in town who receives carcasses from cattle-raisers for sale, and disposes of them to retail butchers.

Meat-screen (mêt'akrén), n. A metal screen placed behind meat while roasting, to reflect the heat of the fire.

Meatus (mê-s'tus), n. [L., from meo, to go.] A passage: a term applied in anatomy to various ducts and passages of the body; as, the meatus auditorius, the passage of the ear; meatus cysticus, the gall-duct.

Meaty (mêt'ī), a. Abounding in meat; fleshy, but not fat; resembling meat; as, a meaty flavour.

Meaw, Meawl (mû,mûl). See Mxw, Mxwl.

Meazel (mē'zēl), n. Same as Measle.
Measle (mē'zēl), v. i. To fall in very fine drops: said of rain. See MISTLE, MIZZLE.

The air feels more moist when the water is in small than in great drops in measling and soaking rain, than in great showers. Arbuthnot.

Mebles, n. pl. [Fr. meubles.] Movable goods. Chaucer.

Mechanic (mē-kan'ik), n. 1. One skilled or employed in shaping and uniting materials, as wood, metal, &c., into any kind of structure, machine, or other object; an artisan; an artificer; one who follows a mechanical occupation for his living: a term somewhat loosely applied, but always excluding agricultural labourers, or labourers who work with pick, shovel, spade, or similar tools, and sometimes restricted to those employed in making and repairing machinery.—Mechanics institute, an institution for the instruction and recreation of persons of the lower and artisan classes, by means of lectures, a library, museum, courses of lessons, &c.—SYN. Artificer, artisan, operative.

Mechanic (mē-kan'ik), a. Same as Mechanical, but not so commonly or widely applied. In the following quotations it is used in the sense noted under MECHANICAL, 4.

Mechanic slaves
 With greasy aprons, rules, and hammers. Shak.
 To make a god, a hero, or a king.
 Descend to a mechanic dialect. Roscommon.

Mechanical (mē-kan'ik-əl), a. [L. mechanicus, Gr. mechanikos, from mēchanē, a machine.] 1. Pertaining to or in accordance with the principles or laws of mechanics; depending upon mechanism or machinery; as, a mechanical contrivance.—2. Resembling a machine; as (a) acting without thought or independence of judgment: said of persons; as, he was a mechanical follower of the precepts of his master. (b) Done as if by a machine, that is, without deliberate design, but by the mere force of habit, or characterized by slavish and unthinking obedience to rule or external guidance; as, he made a mechanical movement with his hand; the artists' work betrayed a mechanical style of drawing.—3. Pertaining to artisans or mechanics or their employments. Hence—4.† In disparagement, of mean occupation; base; rude; mean; vulgar; servile. 'Base and mechanical nigardize.' Holland.

Hang him, mechanical salt-butter rogue! Shak.

See also quotations under MECHANIC.—5. Acting by or resulting from weight or momentum; as, mechanical pressure.—6. Pertaining to those changes of bodies in which they form compounds without losing their identity in the compound substance: as opposed to chemical; as, a mechanical mixture; mechanical decomposition.—Mechanical philosophy, is that which explains the phenomena of nature and the operations of corporeal things on the principles of mechanics, viz. the motion, gravity, figure, arrangement, disposition, greatness, or smallness of the parts which compose natural bodies.—Mechanical powers, the simple instruments or elements of which every machine, however complicated, must be constructed; they are the lever, the wheel and axle, the pulley, the inclined plane, the wedge, and the screw.—Mechanical solution of a problem, a solution by any art or contrivance not strictly geometrical, as by means of the ruler and compasses or other instruments.—Mechanical theory, in med., that system by which all diseases were attributed principally to lentor, or morbid viscosity of the blood.—Rocks of mechanical origin, in geol. rocks composed of sand, pebbles, fragments, and the like, mechanically united; as distinguished from those which have a regular crystalline texture.—Mechanical curve, a curve of such a nature that the relation between the abscissa and the ordinate cannot be expressed by an algebraic equation. Such curves are now generally called transcendental curves.—Mechanical, Chemical. These terms are thus distinguished: those changes which bodies undergo without altering their constitution, that is, losing their identity, such as changes of place, of figure, &c., are mechanical; those which alter the constitution of bodies, making them different substances, as when flour, yeast, and water unite to form bread, are chemical. In the one case, the changes relate to masses of matter, as the motions of the heavenly bodies, or the action of the wind on a ship under sail; in the other case, the changes occur between the particles of matter, as the action of heat in melting lead, or the union of sand and lime forming mortar. Most of what are usually called the mechanic arts are partly mechanical and partly chemical.

Mechanical (mē-kan'ik-əl), n. A mechanic.

'Rude mechanicals.' Shak.

Mechanicalise (mē-kan'ik-al-iz), v. t. To render mechanical or mean; to debase.

Mechanically (mē-kan'ik-al-iz), adv. In a mechanical manner: (a) according to the laws of mechanism or good workmanship. (b) By physical force or power. (c) In a manner resembling a machine: without thought or intelligence; without independence of judgment; by the mere force of habit; as, to play on an instrument mechanically.

Mechanicalness (mē-kan'ik-al-nes), n. The state of being mechanical or governed by, or as if by, mechanism.

Mechanician (mek-an-ish'an), n. One skilled in mechanics.

The observations of mechanicians show certain things respecting falling bodies on our globe. Brougham.

Mechano-chemical (mē-kan'ik-kem'ik-əl), a. Pertaining to or dependent on both mechanics and chemistry; a term used specifically in regard to the sciences of galvanism, electricity, and magnetism, which exhibit phenomena which require for their explanation an application of the laws of mechanics and chemistry.

Mechanics (mē-kan'iks), n. 1.† The science of machinery. Newton.—2. A common name for the science which treats of motion and force. This science has often been divided by writers into—statics, embracing the principles or theorems which apply to bodies at rest under the action of natural forces; and dynamics, embracing the principles of equilibrium and action of bodies in a state of motion. Other writers subdivide the subject into the mechanics of solids and the mechanics of fluids; and a modern division is into kinematics, or the laws of motion geometrically considered, without reference to the causes of motion, and dynamics, or the laws of motion and force.—Animal mechanics, a branch of mechanics in which the principles of the science are applied to the explanation of the solid framework of the human body, and also of the different animal motions, the whole structure being regarded as a machine. The most important mechanical principle which comes into operation in the animal machine is that of the lever. The bones form the arms of the levers, the muscles, contractile at the command of the will or fancy, represent the power, the joints the fulcrums or points of support; and the weight of the body or of individual limbs, as it may happen, constitute the weight or resistance, increased, as in the case of the hands at times, by some substance carried or held by them.—Practical mechanics, the application of the principles of mechanics to practical purposes, as the construction of machines, buildings, &c.—Rational mechanics, that branch of mechanics which treats of the theory of motion; kinematics.

Mechanism (mek'an-izm), n. 1. The parts collectively, or the arrangement of the parts of a machine, engine, or instrument intended to apply power to a useful purpose; the arrangement and relation of the moving and other parts in a machine; mechanical construction; machinery; as, the mechanism is very complicated; a skilful piece of mechanism.

Art does not analyse, or abstract, or classify, or generalize; it does not lay bare the mechanism of thought, or evolve by a rigid dialectic the secret order and system of nature and history. Dr. Caird.

2. Action according to the laws of mechanics; mechanical action. [Rare.]

After the chyle has passed through the lungs, nature continues her usual mechanism to convert it into animal substances. Arbuthnot.

Mechanist (mek'an-ist), n. 1. A maker of machines, or one skilled in machinery; a mechanic.

The mechanist will be afraid to assert before hardy contradiction the possibility of tearing down bulwarks with a silk-worm's thread. Johnson.

2. One of a school of philosophers who refer all the changes in the universe to the effect of merely mechanical forces.

Mechanize (mek'an-iz), v. t. pret. & pp.

mechanized; ppr. mechanizing. To subject to contrivance, art, or skill; to form by contrivance or design; to form mechanically. 'The human frame a mechanized automaton.' Shelley.

Mechanographic (mek'an-ō-graf'ik), a. 1. Treating of mechanics. [Rare.]—2. Pertaining to mechanography.

Mechanographer (mek'an-ō-gra-fist), n. An artist who, by mechanical means, multiplies copies of any work of art, writing, or the like.

Mechanography (mek'an-ō-gra-fī), n. [Gr. mēchanē, a machine, and graphō, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanurgy (mek'an-ēr-jī), n. [Gr. mēchanē, a machine, and ergon, work.] That branch of mechanics which treats of moving machines. [Rare.]

Mechitarist (mek-it'ar-ist), n. [After Mechitar Da Petro, a native of Sebaste, who founded a religious society at Constantinople for the purpose of disseminating a knowledge of the old Armenian language and literature.] One of a society or sect of Armenians acknowledging the authority of the pope, but retaining their own ritual with a few alterations. They have printed the best editions of Armenian classics.

Mechlin (mek'lin), n. A species of fine lace made at Mechlin or Malines in Belgium.

Mechlin (mek'lin), a. The term applied to fine kind of lace manufactured at Mechlin, or Malines, in Belgium.

Mechoacan Root (mē-cho'ā-a-kan), n. [From Mechoacan, in Mexico, whence it is obtained.] The large thick tuber of Ipomoea (Batatas) Jalapa, a native of Mexico and the Southern States of America. It yields a jalap of very feeble properties.

Mecometer (mē-kom'et-ēr), n. [Gr. mēkos, length, and metron, measure.] A kind of graduated compass used to measure the length of new-born infants.

Meconate (mē-kon-āt), n. A salt of meconic acid.

Meconic (mē-kon'ik), a. [Gr. mēkōn, a poppy.] A term applied to the peculiar acid with which morphia is combined in opium. When pure, meconic acid (C₇H₅O₆) forms small white crystals. Its aqueous solution forms a deep red colour with the persalts of iron, which therefore are good tests for it. It is a trisbasic acid.

Meconin, Meconine (mē-kon-in), n. [Gr. mēkōn, a poppy.] (C₁₀H₁₀O₄). A neutral substance existing in opium. It is a white fusible substance, composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen.

Meconium (mē-kō-ni-um), n. [Gr. mēkōnion, from mēkōn, a poppy.] 1.† The inspissated juice of the poppy.—2. The first feces of infants.

Meconopsis (mē-kō-nop-sis), n. [Gr. mēkōn, a poppy, and opsis, appearance.] A small genus of plants, nat. order Papaveraceae. They are perennial, rarely annual herbs, with yellow juice, entire or lobed leaves, and handsome yellow, purple, or blue flowers on long stalks, which droop when in bud. One species (M. cambrica, or Welsh poppy) occurs in Great Britain, and is often grown on rockwork as an ornamental plant.

Medal (med'al), n. [Fr. médaille, from L. metallum, Gr. metallon, metal. See METAL.] A coin, or a piece of metal in the form of a coin, stamped with some figure or device to preserve the portrait of some distinguished person, or the memory of an illustrious action or event, or as a reward or merit.

The Roman medals were their current coin; when an action deserved to be recorded on a coin, it was stamped and issued out of the mint. Adams.

Medalet (med'al-et), n. A smaller kind of medal, not larger than the varieties of the ordinary current coinage of a country, but differing from that in never passing for money or having the same die. Medallets are sometimes suspended from the person, and in Catholic countries are impressed with figures of saints.

Medallic (mē-dal'ik), a. Pertaining to a medal or to medals.

Admiral Vernon will shine in our medallic history. H. Walpole.

Medallion (mē-dal'yun), n. [Fr. médallion, from médaille.] 1. A large antique medal struck in Rome and in the provinces by the emperors. They were usually of gold or silver, and exceeded in size the largest coins of these metals of which the name and value in the fields of Europe. M. lupulina, black medick or black nonsuch, so called from the black colour of the ripe pods, grows in meadows, pastures, and waste grounds, and affords excellent fodder for sheep. It is also known, from the colour of its flower, by the name of yellow lucerne, and to farmers by that of hop-trefoil, from its resemblance to the true hop-trefoil, or yellow clover. M. arborea (tree-medick) is a villous shrubby plant, a native of the south of Europe. There are about forty species, natives of Europe, Western Asia, and Northern Africa.

Medusa's Head, n. 1. A name sometimes applied to those species of star-fish which have the rays very much branched, as in the genus Euryale.—2. In bot. the plant Euphorbia caput Medusæ.

Medusian (me-dû'si-an), n. A member of the order Medusidæ, or jelly-fishes.

Medusidæ (me-dû'si-dê), n. pl. The jelly-fishes or sea-nettles, an order of Hydrozoa, co-extensive with the sub-class Discophora, whose hydrosome is free and oceanic, consisting of a single nectocalyx or swimming-bell, from the roof of which one or several polypites are suspended. The nectocalyx is furnished with a system of canals, and a number of tentacles depend from its margin. The reproductive organs appear as processes either of the sides of the polypite or of the nectocalycine canals. The order has been very much restricted by modern naturalists, and it is by no means improbable that it will ultimately be entirely done away with, very many of its members having been shown to be really the free generative buds of other Hydrozoa.

Medusidan (me-dû'si-dan), n. A member of the order Medusidæ.

Medusiform (me-dû'si-al-form), a. Resembling a medusa in shape.

Melandryidae (mel-an-dri'f-dē), n. pl. [Gr. mela, black, drys, an oak or other tree resembling it, and eidos, resemblance.] Leach's name for a family of coleopterous insects belonging to the section Heteromera, specially distinguished by the large size of the three terminal joints of the maxillary palpi. These insects chiefly reside beneath the bark of trees. One species (Melandrya caraboides) is found in this country.

Melanerpinæ (mel'an-er-pi'nē), n. pl. [Gr. mela, melanos, black, and erpinō, to creep.] An American sub-family of scaporial birds of the family or order Picidae; black woodpeckers.

Melanesian (mē-la-nē'āi-an), n. [Gr. mela, black, and nēos, an island.] The term applied to a family of languages spoken by the inhabitants of numerous islands in the Pacific and Indian Oceans.

Mélange (mā-lāzh), n. [Fr. from meler, to mix. See MELT.] A mixture.

Melania (mē-lā'ni-ā), n. [Gr. mela, melan, black.] A genus of fluviatile, operculate gastropods. The name is derived from the black colour of the species. See MELANTIDE.

Melanian (mē-lā'ni-an), n. A gastropod of the family Melanidae.

Melanic (mē-lā'nik), a. Of or pertaining to melanosis. Melanic deposit, a black colouring matter deposited from the blood under special circumstances. See MELANOSIS.

Melaniids, Melanitids (mē-lā'ni-dē, mel-an'it-dē), n. pl. A family of pectinibranchiate gastropods, of the section Holostomata and order Frosobranchia, characterized by the shell being spiral and turreted, the aperture often channelled or notched in front, outer lip acute, and operculum horny and spiral. It comprises two genera, Melania and Faludomus.

Melaniline (mel-an'ī-lin), n. [Gr. mela, black, and E. aniline.] ($C_{12}H_{13}N_3$) A basic substance obtained from chloride of cyanogen and aniline.

Melanism (mel'an-izm), n. [Gr. mela, melan, black.] In physiol. an undue development of colouring material in the skin and its appendages: the opposite of albinism.

Melanite (mel'an-lē), n. [Gr. mela, melan, black.] A mineral, an iron-alumina variety of garnet, of a velvet black or grayish black, occurring always in crystals of a dodecahedral form. Melanite is perfectly opaque. It is found among volcanic substances, chiefly near Albano and Frascati, in the neighbourhood of Rome.

Melanochroic (mel'an-ō-kro'ik), a. [Gr. mela, melanos, black, and chrois, colour.] One of the divisions into which Professor Huxley classifies the races of men; it includes the dark whites, and is supposed by him to be sprung from an intermixture of the Australoids and Xanthochroes.

Melanochroite (mel'an-ō-kro'it), n. [See MELANOCHROIC.] ($PbCrO_4$) A basic chromate of lead, found at Beresof in the Ural.

Melanoma (mel'an-ō-ma), n. Same as Melanoria.

Melanopathy (mel-an-op'a-thi), n. [Gr. mela, melanos, black, and pathos, affection.] A disease of the skin, which consists in augmentation of black pigment, generally in patches. Dunlopian.

Melanopsis (mel-an-op'sis), n. [Gr. mela, melan, black, and opsis, appearance.] A genus of fresh-water, testaceous, turbinate molluscs, found in the south of Europe, and especially near the Mediterranean. They occur fossil in most of the tertiary beds of Europe.

Melanorrhoea (mel'an-ō-rē'a), n. [Gr. mela, melanos, black, and rheō, to flow.] A genus of very large Indian trees, belonging to the nat. order Anacardiaceae. It includes M. uittatissima, or black-varnish tree—the theet-tree of Burmah and khew of Manipoor—which produces a wood of a dark colour, so hard that native anchors are made of it, and yields when tapped a varnish which becomes black on exposure, and is much valued for lacquering boats, vessels designed to contain liquids, articles of furniture, and the like.

Melanosis (mel-an-ō'sis), n. [Gr. a growing black, from mela, melan, black.] In pathol. an organic affection, due to the softening of the tissue of the part through disease, especially tubercles, in which the tissue is converted into a black, hard, homogeneous substance, near which ulcers or cavities may form. The lungs are the chief seat of this affection.

Melanosperm (mel-an-ō-spērm), n. [Gr. mela, melanos, black, and sperma, seed.] An alga belonging to the division Melanospermes.

Melanospermeæ (mel-an-ō-spērm-ē-s), n. pl. A division of algae, characterized by their dark olivaceous spores. This division contains many of the largest and most important algae, especially the large brown seaweeds which seem in all countries to form the extreme limit of seaweed growth.

Melanotic (mel-an-ō'tik), a. Relating to melanosis.

Melanotype (mel-an-ō'tip), n. Same as Melanotype.

Melanterite (mē-lān'tēr-it), n. [Gr. mela, melan, black.] A mineralogical name of the native sulphate of iron.

Melanthaceæ (mel-an-thā's-ē-s), n. pl. [Gr. mela, melan, black, and anthos, a flower.] A nat. order of poisonous endogens, consisting of bulbous, tuberous, and fibrous rooted plants, with or without stems, and having parallel-veined leaves. The fruit is a three-parted capsule. There are about 150 species, natives of all parts of the world, some of which resemble crocuses and some small lilies. The most important species are medical plants, as the meadow-saffron (Colchicum autumnale), white hellebore (Veratrum album), and cevadilla (Asagrea officinalis). The root of Helonia dioica is used in North America as a tonic and anthelmintic.

Melanthaceous (mel-an-thā'shus), a. In bot. of or belonging to the order Melanthaceæ.

Melanure, Melanurus (mē-lā-nūr, mel-a-nū'rus), n. [Gr. mela, melan, black, and oura, a tail.] A small fish of the Mediterranean, the Sparus melanurus of Linnaeus, a species of githud.

Melaphyre (mē-lā'fir), n. A compact black or blackish-gray trap-rock, consisting of a matrix of labradorite and augite, in which are imbedded crystals of the same minerals, and sometimes uniaxial mica, hornblende, and iron pyrites. It contains less iron and is of less specific gravity than dolerite, into which it sometimes passes.

Mela-rosa, Mella-rosa (mē-lā-rō-zā), n. [It. mela, an apple, and rosa, a rose.] The fruit of a tree of the genus Citrus, probably a variety of the lime C. Limetta, or sweet lime, cultivated in Italy, and deriving its name from its fragrance resembling that of a rose.

Melas (mē-lās), n. [Gr., black.] An endemic disease of Arabia, characterized by dark or black spots on the skin.

Melasma (mē-lās'ma), n. [Gr., a black or livid spot, from mela, black.] A disease of aged persons, in which a black spot appears upon the skin, especially of the extremities, which soon forms a foul ulcer. Called also Melasma.

Melasmic (mē-lās'mik), n. See MELASMA.

Melasoma (mē-lās-ō'ma), n. [Gr. mela, black, and soma, body.] A very extensive family of heteromorous coleoptera, so called from the black colour of the species; it is the Tenebrionidae of Leach. It contains three large genera, Pimelia, Blapet, and Tenebrio.

Melasses (mē-lās'ez), n. sing. [Fr. mélasse, It. melassa, from L. mel, honey.] Same as Molasses.

Melastoma (mē-lās-to-ma), n. [Gr. mela, black, and stoma, mouth, from the fruit of some of the species, when eaten, staining the lips black.] A genus of plants of about forty species, natives of tropical Asia, North Australia, and Oceania, the type of the nat. order Melastomaceæ. They are shrubs, usually covered with harsh hairs; the flowers are large, white, rose-coloured or purple, and the entire leaves three to seven nerved. The leaves of M. malabarica, an East Indian species, are used by the natives where it grows as a remedy in diarrhoea, dysentery, and mucous discharges.

Melastomaceæ (mē-lās-to-mā's-ē-s), n. pl. An extensive nat. order of epipetalous exogens, nearly related to Myrtaceæ, but they differ remarkably in the anthers, which usually open by pores, and are inflexed in bud, while the stamens are usually declinate and of two forms. They are shrubs or trees, rarely herbs, with opposite or whorled leaves, often prominently three or five nerved, and often handsome flowers. They receive their name from the fruit of some of the species staining the lips of a black or deep purple colour. The species, of which about 1250 are known, abound chiefly in tropical countries, especially in South and West America.

Melastomaceous (mē-lās-to-mā'shus), a. Belonging or relating to the nat. order Melastomaceæ.

Melchisedecian (mē-lir's-dē'āhan), n. One of a sect in the third century who affirmed Melchisedec to be Christ, or the Holy Ghost, and paid him divine adoration. Some regarded him as even superior to Christ. Written also Melchisedecian.

Melchite (mēl'it), n. One of an eastern sect of Christians who, while adhering to the ceremonies and liturgy of the Greek Church, acknowledge the authority of the pope. The name is also given to such members of the Greek community as are Roman Catholics.

Melchisedecian (mē-lir's-dē'āhan), n. Same as Melchisedecian.

Melder (mēl'dēr), n. [Icel. meldr, flour or corn in the mill, from mala, to grind. See MELAL.] The quantity of meal ground at one time. [Scotch.]

That ilka melder, wi' the miller,
Thou sat as lang as thou had siller. BURNS.

Mele, n. Meal; dinner, &c. Chaucer.

Melagrines (mē-lā'grī'nē), n. pl. A sub-family of the Phasianidae, or pheasant family, comprising the turkeys and guineafowl.

Melagris (mē-lā'grīs), n. A genus of birds of the family Phasianidae, including the turkeys. See TURKEY.

Mélée (mā-lā), n. [Fr., a participial substantive from meler, to mix, O. Fr. miesler, Fr. miesler, L. L. miculare, a freq. of micco, to mix.] A fight in which the combatants are mingled in one confused mass; a hand-to-hand conflict; an affray; a scuffle; a mella.

Melaguetta-pepper (mē-lā-gwēt'a-pep'ēr), n. Same as Malaguetta-pepper.

Melena (mē-lē'nā), n. Same as Melena.

Melœs (mē-lēs), n. [L., a badger.] A genus of plantigrade mammals forming according to some zoologists the type genus of the family Melidae, but by others referred to the family Ursidae (bears), forming a sort of connecting link between them and the weasels and otters (Mustelidae); the badgers. See BADGER.

Meletian (mē-lē'shan), n. Eccles. (a) a follower of Meletius, an Egyptian bishop, who refused to hold communion with the lapsed on their repentance. (b) a follower of St. Meletius in the schism of Antioch in the fifth century.

Mele-tide, n. [Mele, for meal, and tide, time.] Meal-time. Chaucer.

Melia (mē-lī'a), n. [Gr., the ash, from the resemblance of the leaves.] A small genus of trees, nat. order Meliaceæ, natives of tropical Asia and Australia. M. Azadirachta, or margosa, is an evergreen which grows to the height of 40 feet, and bears white flowers. It is a native of the East Indies. Its bark yields a bitter used as a tonic, its seeds yield a valuable oil, and its trunk a tenacious gum. M. Azadirach, sometimes called Perian lilac, pride of India, and bead-tree, is a native of the north of India, and much cultivated in the southern parts of the United States, as well as in southern Europe. The bark of the root is said to be a powerful vermifuge.

Meliaceæ (mē-lī-ā's-ē-s), n. pl. A nat. order of polypetalous dicotyledons, distinguished by their stamens being united into a tube. It consists of shrubs and trees chiefly inhabiting tropical Asia and America, and the species possess bitter, tonic, and astringent properties. They have small paniculate flowers, and often pinnate leaves.

Melibean, Melibean (mē-lī-bē'an), a. [After Melibeus, one of the interlocutors in the first eclogue of Virgil.] In rhet. and poetry, alternate; alternately responsive; alternating.

And Danton rises and speaks, and Collet d'Herbois rises, and Curate Grégoire, and lame Couthon of the mountain rises; and in rapid Melibean stanzas, only a few lines each, they propose motions not a few. Carlyle.

Memory (me-mó'ri), n. [L. memoria, memory, from memor, mindful, from memini, to remember.] 1. The power or the capacity of having what was once present to the senses or the understanding suggested again to the mind, accompanied by a distinct consciousness that it has formerly been present to it; the faculty of the mind by which it retains the knowledge of past events, or ideas which are past; remembrance; recollection. The word memory is not employed uniformly in the same precise sense, but it always expresses some modification of that faculty which enables us to treasure up and preserve for future use the knowledge which we acquire; a faculty which is obviously the great foundation of all intellectual improvement. The word memory is sometimes used to express a capacity of retaining knowledge, and sometimes a power of recalling it to our thoughts when we have occasion to apply it to use. The latter operation of the mind, however, is more properly called recollection.—2. The act of remembering.

Some little memory of me will stir him. Shak.

3. The state of being remembered; exemption from oblivion; continued existence in the recollection of men; that which is remembered about a person or event. 'And left their memories a world's curse.' Tennyson.

7. An act or ceremony in remembrance; a service for the dead.

Their Dirige, their Trinité, and their gifts,
Their memories, their singings, and their glories.

Memory, Recollection, Remembrance, Reminiscences. Memory is the faculty or capacity itself; recollection and reminiscences are exercises of the faculty, while reminiscences is the thing remembered. Recollection (i. e., again, and collige, collectum, to gather, to collect) differs from remembrance in implying more effort. To remember is to keep in mind, and things thus laid up in memory come to our remembrance without voluntary or conscious effort, but we strive to recollect things or thoughts past and partially forgotten. Recollection, like reminiscences, is sometimes used in the sense of that which is recollected, as, recollections of the Arabian Nights; but it differs from it in that its object is more complex, not one scene or event, but a connected series. Recollection in this sense, as well as reminiscences, being more concrete than the allied words, are frequently used in the plural. Reminiscences is scarcely used in reference to past thoughts, being commonly used in reference to past events, while recollection is peculiarly appropriate for the act of recalling mental operations. We recollect the steps in a long mathematical operation, we remember a poem or air laid up in memory.

Mercury, after Giovanni da Bologna.

as the god of eloquence, of commerce, and of robbery. He was also the messenger, herald, and ambassador of Jupiter. As a Roman divinity he was merely the patron of commerce and gain.—2. SYN Hg; at. wt. 200. Quicksilver, a metal whose specific gravity is greater than that of any other metal, except the platinum metals, gold, and tungsten, being 13.54, or thirteen times and a half heavier than water. It is the only metal which is liquid at common temperatures. It freezes at a temperature of 39° or 40° below the zero of Fahrenheit, that is, at a temperature of 71° or 72° below the freezing-point of water. Under a heat of 600° it rises in fumes and is gradually converted into a red oxide. Mercury is used in barometers to ascertain the weight of the atmosphere, and in thermometers to determine the temperature of the air, for which purpose it is well adapted by its expansibility, and the extensive range between its freezing and boiling points. Preparations of this metal are among the most powerful poisons, and are extensively used as medicines. The preparation called calomel or mercurous chloride (HgCl) is a most efficacious deobstruent. Another valuable preparation is corrosive sublimate or mercuric chloride (HgCl₂). From the fluid state in which mercury exists it readily combines with most of the metals, to which, if in sufficient quantity, it imparts a degree of fluidity or softness: these compounds are termed amalgams (See AMALGAM). Mercury is chiefly found in the state of sulphide, but it is also found native. The chief mines of mercury are in Spain, but it is also found in Germany, Italy, China, and Peru.—Native or virgin mercury, the pure metal found in the form of globules in cavities of the ores of this metal.—Corneous mercury, the protochloride of mercury. Called also Horn-mercury and Mercurial Horn-ore.—3. In med. any preparation of mercury used as a remedy.—4. Warmth or liveliness of temperament; spirit; sprightly qualities; hence, liability to change; fickleness.

He was so full of mercury that he could not be long in any friendship, or to any design. Sp. Servant.

5. A genus of plants, Mercurialis (which see); in America, applied to several climbing plants, most frequently to the Rhus toxicodendron or poison ivy.—6. In astron. the planet that revolves round the sun within the orbit of the planet Venus and next to it. It is visible to the naked eye in the evening when it is to the east of the sun, but only when near its greatest distance or elongation from the sun. Similarly, it is visible in the morning before sunrise, only when near its greatest elongation westward of the sun. Its apparent diameter varies from 5 to 12 seconds; the real diameter is about 3140 miles. Its bulk is to that of the earth as 63 to 1000. It revolves on an axis (the inclination of which to the ecliptic is not determined) in 24 hours 5 minutes 23 seconds. The mean sidereal revolution is performed in 87 300259 mean solar days. It has seven times the light and heat of the earth. Mean distance from the sun 36,000,000 miles. 7. A common name for a newspaper or periodical publication; hence, sometimes a newspaper carrier or a seller of newspapers.

Those who sell them (news-books) by wholesale from the press are called mercuries. Cutler.

8. A messenger; an intelligence.

Mercury (mér-kū-rī), v. t. To wash with a preparation of mercury.

Mercury Goose-foot (mér-kū-rī gōo'-fēt), n. One of the common names given to Chenopodium Bonus-Henriens. See CHENOPODIUM.

Mercy (mér'sī), n. [Fr. merced, It. mercede, from L. merces, mercedis, hire, pay, recompense, in L. L. mercy, from stem of mergo, to deserve.] 1. That benevolence, mildness, or tenderness of heart which disposes a person to overlook injuries or to treat an offender better than he deserves, the disposition that tempers justice and induces an injured person to forgive trespasses and injuries, and to forbear punishment or inflict less than law or justice will warrant. In this sense there is perhaps no word in our language precisely synonymous with mercy. It implies benevolence, tenderness, mildness, pity or compassion, and clemency, but exercised only toward offenders. Mercy is a distinguishing attribute of the Supreme Being.

The Lord is long-suffering and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity and transgression, and by no means clearing the guilty. Nom. xiv. 18.

The quality of mercy is not strained; It droppeth, as the gentle rain from heaven, Upon the place beneath. It is twice blest; it blesseth him that gives and him that takes. Shak.

2. An act or exercise of mercy or favour; a kindness proceeding from Providence; blessing; as, it is a mercy that they escaped.

I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies . . . which thou hast showed unto thy servant. Gen. xxxii. 10.

3. Pity; compassion manifested toward a person in distress.

And he said, He that showed mercy on him. Luke x. 37.

4. Discretion; unrestrained exercise of will or authority; often in the phrase at one's mercy, that is, completely in one's power.

And the offender's life lies in the mercy Of the duke only. Shak.

Thy cruelty . . . hath . . . left thee to the mercy of the law. Shak.

A lover is ever complaining of cruelty while anything is denied him, and when the lady consents to be cruel, she is, from the next moment, at his mercy. Swift.

—To cry mercy, to beg pardon.

I cry thee mercy with all my heart. Dryden.

—Sisters of Mercy, the name given to members of female religious communities founded for the purpose of nursing the sick at their own homes, visiting prisoners, especially persons condemned to death, attending lying-in hospitals, superintending the education of females, protecting women out of employment, and the performance of similar works of charity and mercy. In connection with the Roman Catholic Church, an order of these sisters was founded at Sass, in the Sardinian States, by P. Batin, vicar-general of the diocese, in 1823—hence called the order of Sass; and another was shortly after founded in Dublin by Mother Catherine McAuley. Communities of Sisters of Mercy are now widely distributed over Europe and America, some of them being connected with the Church of England.

Mercy-seat (mér'sī-sēt), n. The place of mercy or forgiveness; the propitiatory, the covering of the ark of the covenant among the Jews. This was of gold, and its ends were fixed to two cherubs, whose wings extended forward and formed a kind of throne for the majesty of God, who is represented in Scripture as sitting between the cherubs. It was from this seat that God gave his oracles to Moses, or to the high-priest who consulted him.

Metallography (met'al-og'rā-fī), n. [Or metallous, metal, and graphē, to describe.] An account of metals, or a treatise on metallic substances, the science of metals.

Metalloid (met'al-oid), n. [Or metallous, metal, and oides, resemblance.] In chem. a term which has been variously applied, as (1) to the metallic bases of the fixed alkalies and alkaline earths, probably in consequence of their low specific gravity, and (2) to all the non-metallic elementary substances. In the latter sense it is now used by chemists. The metalloids are thirteen in number: oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, carbon, chlorine, bromine, iodine, fluorine, sulphur, selenium, phosphorus, boron, and silicon. The distinction between a metal and a metalloid is, however, purely artificial, being based on physical rather than chemical criteria, but, broadly, a metal may be said to differ from a metalloid in being an excellent conductor of heat and electricity, in reflecting light powerfully, and in being electro-positive. Though a metalloid may possess one or more of these characters, it will not be found to unite them all. Berzelius, in his classification, restricts the term metalloid to the inflammable non-metallic elements, viz. sulphur, phosphorus, carbon, boron. See Elementary Substances under CLASSIFICATION, see also METAL.

Metalloid (met'al-oid), n. Relating to metalloids, like metal, having the form or appearance of a metal.

Metalloidal (met'al-oid'al), a. Same as Metalloid.

Metallogist (met'al-og'ist), n. Pertaining to metallurgy or the art of working metals. —Metallurgical chemistry, that part of chemistry which teaches the combinations and analyses of metals.

Metallogical (met'al-og'ik-al), a. Same as Metallogist.

Metallogist (met'al-og'ist), n. One whose occupation is to work metals, or to purify, refine, and prepare metals for use.

Metalurgy (met'al-ur-jī), n. [Or metallous, metal, and urges, work.] The art of working metals, comprehending the whole process of separating them from other matters in the ore, smelting, refining, &c. In a more limited and usual sense, metallurgy is the operation of separating metals from their ores.

tailine by subterranean heat, pressure, or chemical agency. More specifically, (b) the lowest and acide, or non-fossiliferous, stratified rocks, consisting of crystalline schists, and embracing granitoid schist, gneiss, quartz-rock, mica schist, and clay-slate, all of which were originally deposited from water and crystallized by subsequent agencies. They exhibit for the most part cleavage, crumpling, and foliation, and their lines of stratification are often indistinct or obliterated. Although no traces of fossils have been discovered in these rocks, unless plumbeo or graphite, a changed form of carbonaceous matter, and the so called Meson condense, be regarded as fossil, there is no reason to conclude that these rocks, when deposited, did not contain animal or vegetable organisms, the traces of which may have been obliterated by the agency which produced the metamorphism.

In geological nomenclature, the crystalline stratified rocks—gneiss, mica-schist, clay-slate, &c.—are termed Metamorphic, and erected into a separate system. Strictly speaking, 'metamorphic' applies to the power or force causing the change, 'metamorphism' the process, and 'metamorphosis' the result. Hence we might to speak of metamorphic agency and metamorphosed rocks.

Metamorphism (met-a-mor'fiz), n. 1. The process of metamorphosing, or changing the form or structure. 2. The state or quality of being metamorphic, the change undergone by stratified rocks under the influence of heat, chemical agents, mechanical agents, as pressure. It is divided into two kinds: Metaplastics and paraplastics (which see).

that kind of metamorphism affecting large tracts and appearing to be chiefly due to wet heat, that is, to boiling water or steam under high pressure.

The great mass of Gneiss granite was produced out of Cambro-Silurian rocks by intense metamorphism.

Metaphor (met'a-fēr), n. [Or metaphora, from metaphero, to transfer, metas, over, and phero, to carry.] A figure of speech founded on the resemblance which one object is supposed to bear, in some respect, to another, and by which a word is transferred from an object to which it properly belongs to another in such a manner that a comparison is implied, though not formally expressed, a simile without any word expressing comparison; a short simile. Thus, 'that man is a fox,' is a metaphor, but 'that man is like a fox,' is a simile or comparison. In metaphor the similitude is contained in the name, a man is a fox, means, a man is as crafty as a fox. So we say, a man bristles his anger, that is, he strains it to a bristle, restrains a horse, beauty ennobles love or tender passions; opposition free courage. Simile, Metaphor, Allegory, Parable. See under SKILL.

Metaphoric, Metaphorical (met'a-for'ik), a. Pertaining to metaphor, comprising a metaphor; not literal; as, a metaphoric use of words; a metaphoric expression.

The expression 'applying capital' is, of course, metaphoric, what is really applied is labour, capital being an indispensable condition. J. S. Mill

Metaphorically (met-a-for'ik-al), adv. In a metaphorical manner; not literally.

Metaphoricalness (met-a-for'ik-al-ness), n. The state or quality of being metaphorical.

Metaphorist (met'a-fēr-ist), n. One that makes metaphors.

Let the poet send to the metaphorist for his allegories.

Metaphosphate (met-a-for'ik), n. [Prefix meta-, and phosphate.] A salt formed by the union of metaphosphoric acid with a base.

Metaphosphoric (met-a-for'ik), a. [Prefix meta-, and phosphoric.] Pertaining to, produced from, or resembling phosphorus or phosphoric acid. Metaphosphoric acid, a dry fatty acid obtained by burning phosphorus under a bell-glass filled with air or oxygen, protohydric phosphoric acid (H_2O, P_2O_5).

Metaphrase, Metaphrasis (met'a-frāz, met'a-frāz), n. [Or metaphrasis—metas, over, according to or with, and phrasis, phrase.] 1. A verbal translation, a version or translation of one language into another, word for word. It stands opposed to paraphrase.

The translation is not to be taken as paraphrase, nor to class as metaphrase.

2. A phrase replying to another; a repartee.

I'm somewhat dull, still, in the meanly art Of phrase and metaphrase. J. B. Browning

Metaphrasist (met'a-frāz-ist), n. A person who translates from one language into another, word for word.

Metaphrastic, Metaphractical (met'a-frāz'ik, met'a-frāz'ik-al), a. Clime or literal translation.

Metaphrasmon (met-a-frāz'mon), n. [Or metas, behind, and phras, the midriff.] In anat. the posterior part of the trunk, extending from the inferior and posterior part of the neck as far as the loins.

Metaphysics, Metaphysical (met-a-frīz'ik, met-a-frīz'ik-al), a. [See METAPHYSIC.] 1. Pertaining or relating to metaphysics, abstract, general, existing only in thought, and not in reality.

He knew what's what, and that's as high As metaphysics can fly. Rudyard

According to some acceptations of the word metaphysical, which seem to make it synonymous with transcendental, and referable chiefly to the operations of pure reason, the rejection of whatever is founded in experiment, some of Hume's works are properly metaphysical, and by the very foundation he has given to his philosophy he has made it metaphysical, and consequently not metaphysical. The word metaphysical is however here used in its ordinary and, as it may be termed, popular acceptation, and is applicable to any attempt to analyze mind or to define its elements—a subject in relation to which the word metaphysics is also sometimes used. J. H. Burton

2. According to rules or principles of metaphysics, as, metaphysical reasoning.

Of the whole movement of metaphysical science we have already pointed out Bacon and Descartes as the founders. J. D. Morrell

3. Transcendental or supernatural.

Which line and metaphysical and death seem To have thus crossed withal. Shak.

Metaphysics (met-a-fiz'ik), n. Metaphysics.

Philosophy, that lies 'on heaven before,
Shrinks to see second cause, and is no more;
Physics of metaphysics hangs defiance,
And metaphysics calls for aid, on ocean. Page.

Metaphysically (met-a-fiz'ik-al-ly), adv. In a metaphysical manner.

Metaphysician (met-a-fiz'ik-yan), n. One who is versed in the science of metaphysics.

Metaphysico-theological (met-a-fiz'ik-the-ol-og'ik-al), a. Embracing metaphysics and theology.

Metaphysics (met-a-fiz'ik), n. [Or meta, after, and physica, physics, from physis, nature.] It is said that this name was given to the science by Aristotle or his followers, who considered the science of natural bodies or physics the first in the order of studies, and the science of mind or intelligence to be the second. A word first applied to a certain group of the philosophical dissertations of Aristotle which were placed in a collection of his manuscripts after his treatise on physics. As since employed, it has had various significations. It was appropriated to the ontology and pneumatology of the schoolmen, but latterly it has been understood as applying to all inquiries which seek to trace the branches of human knowledge to their first principles in the constitution of our nature. In the part of the Aristotelian treatise alluded to the problems were concerned with the contemplation of being as being, and the attributes which belong to it as such. This implies that things in general must be divided into beings or things as they are, and into phenomena or things as they appear. In modern usage metaphysics is very frequently held as applying to the former division, that is to the ultimate grounds of being. To attain this end it takes into account the correlative of being, that is, knowledge, and of knowledge not as coming within the province of logic or of mental philosophy, but as it is in relation to being or objective reality. In this respect metaphysics is synonymous with ontology. The sciences has also been considered as synonymous with psychology, or the second division, and to denote that branch of philosophy which investigates the faculties, operations, and laws of the human mind. Regarding the science in its most general sense, Manual proposes the following definition:—"Metaphysics, or the philosophy of the facts of consciousness considered subjectively in relation to the mind knowing, and objectively in relation to the things known, and thus dividing itself naturally into the two branches of psychology and ontology. On the other hand, Ferri in his Institute of Metaphysics occupies himself solely with the questions connected with knowledge, or the nature of our perception of an external world.

He (Descartes) established the fundamental principle, which we regard as the cornerstone of all the metaphysics of modern Europe, namely, that as natural science is based upon inductions drawn from the actual observation of the world without, so metaphysical science is based upon inductions similarly drawn from reflection upon the world within. J. D. Morrell.

Metaphysics (me-taf'iz-ik), n. [Or meta, after, and physica, nature.] Change of form; transformation, metamorphosis.

Metaplasma (met-a-plaz'ma), n. [Or metaplasma, transformation—meta, over, and plasma, to form.] In gram. a change or transmutation in a word by adding, transposing, or retrenching a syllable or letter.

Metaplast (met-a-plast), n. In gram. a word or the stem of a word exhibiting the change of metaplasma.

Metapodium (met-a-pod'i-um), n. [Or meta, after, and pous, podus, a foot.] In zool. the posterior lobe of the foot in mollusca, often called the operculigenous lobe, because it develops the operculum when this structure is present.

Metapophysis (met-a-pof'iz-ik), n. [Or meta, after, and apophysis, a process.] In anat. an exogenous process of the vertebra. These processes are very largely developed in the armadillo, assisting in the support of its carapace or defensive covering.

Metaptosis (met-ap'to-sis), n. [Or meta, denoting change, and ptosis, a falling.] In pathol. any change in a disease is regarded in its nature or seat, transformation.

Metasoma, Metasoma (met-a-som, met-a-sma), n. [Or meta, after, and soma, the body.] In comp. anat. the posterior portion of the body of a cephalopod, consisting of a soft membranous mass enveloped by the mantle and containing the viscera.

Metastasis (me-tas'ta-sis), n. [Or metastasis—meta, over, and stasis, a placing, state, position, from stasis, to stand, to make to stand.] In pathol. a translation or removal of a disease from one part to another, any change in the former seat of a disease, also the change that takes place when the menstrual flow appears from other organs.

Metastatic (met-a-stat'ik), a. Relating to metastasis.

Metastoma (met-a-sto-ma), n. [Or meta, after, and stoma, the mouth.] The plate which closes the mouth posteriorly in the Crustacea.

Metatarsal (met-a-tar'sal), a. [From metatarsus.] Belonging to the metatarsus; as, a metatarsal bone.

Metatarsus (met-a-tar'sus), n. [Or meta, beyond, and tarso, tarsus.] The middle of the foot, or part between the ankle and the toes; the bones coming between the tarsus and the digits in the hind foot of the higher vertebrates. See FOOT.

Metathesis (me-tath'is-iz), n. [Or metathesis—meta, over, and thesis, to set.] 1. In gram. transposition, move especially of the letters, sounds, or syllables of a word, as in the case of A. Sax. ceasian, cesian = E. cancel, A. Sax. bird, or brid = E. bird.—2. In med. a change in place of a morbid substance. a morbid a landholder on condition of receiving a share, generally a half of its produce, the owner furnishing the whole or part of the stock, tools, &c.

Vast estates accustomed by one proprietor, and cultivated by slaves, or at best by poor metayers.

The word is often used in the phrase metayer system, applied to that mode of land cultivation, practiced chiefly in France and Italy, in which the land is cultivated by metayers.

The principle of the metayer system is that the laborer or peasant makes his engagement with the landowner and pays, not a fixed rent, either in money or in kind, but a certain proportion of the produce, or rather that remains of the produce after deducting what is considered necessary to keep up the stock. The proportion is usually, as the same imports, one-half, but in several districts in Italy it is two-thirds. Regarding the supply of stock, the custom varies from place to place. In some places the landowner furnishes the whole, in others half, in others some particular part, as for instance the cattle and feed, the laborer providing the implements. J. S. Hall.

Metasoma (met-a-sma), n. [Or meta, after, and soma, a living being.] One of the two great sections into which Huxley divides the animal kingdom, the other being the Protozoa. The Metasoma are distinguished from the Protozoa in that the substance of the body is differentiated into histogenetic elements, that is to say, into cells. In all the Metasoma the germ has the form of a nucleated cell, the first step in the process of development being the production of a blastoderm by the subdivision of that cell, the cells of the blastoderm giving rise in turn to the histological elements of the adult body. With the exception of certain parasites, and the extremely modified males of a few species, all these animals possess a permanent alimentary cavity, lined by a special layer of cells. Sexual reproduction always occurs, and very generally the male element has the form of bifurcated spermatozoa. The lowest term in the series of the Metasoma is represented by the Porifera or sponges. That portion of the Metasoma which possesses a notochord, and in the adult state have the trunk divided into segments or myotomes, constitute the sub-kingdom Vertebrata. The rest are Invertebrata.

Metos (mets), v.t. pret. and pp. meted; pp.

meting. [A. Sax. metan, D. metra, Goth. metan, G. metzen, to measure, I. metra, to value, from a root seen also in L. metra, a measure (whence E. metre), moderare, to moderate, metior, to measure, I. metrum, a measure, metri met, to measure.] 1. To measure; to ascertain the quantity, dimensions, or capacity of by any rule or standard.

Their metistry

By which the pattern or a measure live
By which the grace must mete the lives of others. Shak.

Hence—2. To measure with the eye; to aim.

Let the mark have a prick to't to mete at. Shak.

3. To be the exact measure or equivalent of; to represent exactly, to accurately define or express. [Poetical.]

Also, met elan.

Who have undue myself from all that best,
Faintest and nearest, to this wretchedness.
Saddest and most afflicted—cast out, cast down—
What word met absolute best? S. B. Browning.

Metre (met') n. [A. Sax. met, met, metre, I. metra, G. metra, G. metra, a measure, with which may be incorporated O. Fr. metre, a boundary mark, from L. metra, a goal.]

Metempsychosis (met-em-psi-k'o-sis), n. [O. E. meta, food, and psyché, a soul.] A tribute or rent paid in vicinals.

Metempsychosis (met-em-psi-k'o-sis), n. One who believes in the metempsychosis or transmigration of souls.

Metempsychosis (met-em-psi-k'o-sis), n. [Or meta, beyond, and psyché, experience, from ps, en, and psyché, trial experiment.] In metaph. beyond or outside of experience; not based on experience; transcendental; a priori, opposed to empirical or experimental.

The exclusion of all metempsychotic questions, the rejection of the metempsychotic method, is the cardinal position of the Positive Philosophy. G. H. Lewis.

Metempsychosis (met-em-psi-k'o-sis), n. [O. E. meta, the system of philosophy based on a priori reasoning, transcendentalism (which see).]

Metempsychosis (me-tom'i-tis), v.t. [See METEMPSYCHOSIS.] To translate from one body to another, as the soul.

The souls of converts after their death Locke affirms to be metempsychosis, or translated into the bodies of men, and there remain certain years for poor men to make their pennyworth out of their bodies. Pechon.

Metempsychosis (me-tom'i-tis), n. [Or meta, denoting change, and psyché, to animate—en, in, and psyché, life, soul.] Transmigration; the passing of the soul of a man after death into some other animal body, a doctrine held by Pythagoras and his followers, and still prevailing in some parts of Asia, particularly in India.

The ages of old live again in us, and in opinions there is a metempsychosis. Cicero.

Metempsychosis (met-em-tis), n. [Or meta, beyond, and psyché, a falling upon, from ps, en, and psyché, a falling, from ps, to fall.] In chem. the solar equation necessary to prevent the new moon from happening a day too late, or the suppression of the bi-monthly once in 184 years. The opposite to this is the premonition, or the addition of a day every 300 years and another every 2400 years.

Metempsychosis (me-tom'i-tis), n. [Or the putting into another body—meta, implying change, and psyché, an embodying or incarnation, from ps, en, in, and psyché, the body.] The transference of the elements of one body into another body and their conversion into its substance, as by decomposition and assimilation. Metempsychosis is in some respects the analogue of metempsychosis. The latter word, however, implies no resolution into elements, and consequently no conversion.

It is not indispensible that man's body is composed of the very same materials, the same protein, and fat, and albumin, and water which constitute the inorganic world—which may unconsciously have served long ago as the dead material which was vivified and utilized in the bodies of extinct crea-

Metallization (met'al-iz-ā'shon), n. The act or process of metallizing or forming into a metal; the operation which gives to a substance its proper metallic properties.

Metallize (met'al-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. metallized; ppr. metallizing. To form into metal; to give its proper metallic properties to.

Metallochrome (met-al'lo-krom), n. [Gr. metallon, a mine, metal, and chroma, colour.] A beautiful prismatic tint produced on polished steel plates on which a thin film of oxide of lead has been deposited by electrolytic action.

Metallochromy (met-al-lok'ro-mi), n. [See METALLOCHROME.] The art or process of colouring metals.

Metallographist (met-al-og'ra-fist), n. A writer on metallography or the subject of metals.

Metallography (met-al-og'ra-fi), n. [Gr. metallon, metal, and graphō, to describe.] An account of metals, or a treatise on metallic substances; the science of metals.

Metalloid (met'al-oid), n. [Gr. metallon, metal, and eidōs, resemblance.] In chem. a term which has been variously applied, as (a) to the metallic bases of the fixed alkalies and alkaline earths, probably in consequence of their low specific gravity; and (b) to all the non-metallic elementary substances. In the latter sense it is now used by chemists. The metalloids are thirteen in number: oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, carbon, chlorine, bromine, iodine, fluorine, sulphur, selenium, phosphorus, boron, and silicon. The distinction between a metal and a metalloid is, however, purely artificial, being based on physical rather than chemical criteria; but, broadly, a metal may be said to differ from a metalloid in being an excellent conductor of heat and electricity, in reflecting light powerfully, and in being electro-positive. Though a metalloid may possess one or more of these characters, it will not be found to unite them all. Berzelius, in his classification, restricts the term metalloid to the inflammable non-metallic elements: viz. sulphur, phosphorus, carbon, boron. See Elementary Substances under ELEMENTARY; see also METAL.

Metalloidal (met'al-oid), a. Relating to metalloids; like metal; having the form or appearance of a metal.

Metalloidal (met'al-oid'al), a. Same as Metalloidal.

Metallogurgic (met-al-er'jik), a. Pertaining to metallurgy or the art of working metals. —Metallogurgic chemistry, that part of chemistry which teaches the combinations and analyses of metals.

Metallogurgical (met-al-er'jik-al), a. Same as Metallogurgic.

Metallogurist (met'al-er-jist), n. One whose occupation is to work metals, or to purify, refine, and prepare metals for use.

Metalurgy (met'al-er-ji), n. [Gr. metallon, metal, and ergon, work.] The art of working metals, comprehending the whole process of separating them from other matters in the ore, smelting, refining, &c. In a more limited and usual sense, metalurgy is the operation of separating metals from their ores.

Metalsman (met'al-man), n. A worker in metals; a coppersmith or tinman.

A smith, or a metalsman, the pot's never from his nose. Burton.

Metamere (met'a-mēr), n. [Gr. meta, with or among, and meros, a part.] In compar. anat. one of a series of similar parts.

Metamerism (met-a-mer'ik), a. In chem. pertaining to or characterized by metamerism; as, aldehyde (C₂H₄O) and oxide of ethylene (C₂H₄O) are metamerism.

Metamerism (met-a-mer'izm), n. [Gr. prefix meta, denoting interchange, and meros, a part.] In chem. the character in certain compound bodies, differing in chemical properties, of having the same chemical elements combined in the same proportion and with the same molecular weight; thus, aldehyde (C₂H₄O) and oxide of ethylene (C₂H₄O) have their elements in the same proportion and the same molecular weight, 44. Metamerismic bodies do not, however, belong to the same class or series of compounds. See ISOMERISM, POLYMERISM.

Metamorphic (met-a-mor'fik), a. [See METAMORPHOSIS.] Producing metamorphosis; changing the form or structure; transforming; as, metamorphic cause or agency; metamorphic action. —Metamorphic rocks, in geol. (a) stratified rocks of any age whose texture has been rendered less or more crystalline by subterranean heat, pressure, or chemical agency. More specifically, (b) the lowest and azoic, or non-fossiliferous, stratified rocks, consisting of crystalline schists, and embracing granitoid schist, gneiss, quartz-rock, mica-schist, and clay-slate, all of which were originally deposited from water and crystallized by subsequent agencies. They exhibit for the most part cleavage, crumpling, and foliation, and their lines of stratification are often indistinct or obliterated. Although no traces of fossils have been discovered in these rocks, unless plumbago or graphite, a changed form of carbonaceous matter, and the so called Eozoön canadense, be regarded as fossils, there is no reason to conclude that these rocks, when deposited, did not contain animal or vegetable organisms, the traces of which may have been obliterated by the agency which produced the metamorphosis.

In geological nomenclature, the crystalline stratified rocks—gneiss, mica-schist, clay-slate, &c.—are termed Metamorphic, and erected into a separate system. Strictly speaking, 'metamorphic' applies to the power or force causing the change; 'metamorphism,' the process; and 'metamorphosis,' the result. Hence we ought to speak of metamorphic agency, and metamorphosed rocks. Page.

Metamorphism (met-a-mor'fiz), n. 1. The process of metamorphosing, or changing the form or structure. —2. The state or quality of being metamorphic; the change undergone by stratified rocks under the influence of heat, chemical agents, mechanical agents, as pressure. It is divided into two kinds—Metapexis and paroptesis (which see).

Metamorphist (met-a-mor'fist), n. One of a sect of sacramentarians of the fifteenth century, who affirm that the body with which Christ rose to heaven was wholly deified, having lost all its humanity.

Metamorphise (met-a-mor'fiz), v.t. To transform; to metamorphose. De Quincey.

Metamorphose (met-a-mor'fōs), v.t. pret. & pp. metamorphosed; ppr. metamorphosing. [Fr. metamorphoser, from metamorphosis (which see).] To change into a different form; to change the shape or character of; to transform; to transmute. 'And earth was metamorphosed into man.' Dryden.

Thou, Julia, thou hast metamorphosed me. Shak.

Metamorphose (met-a-mor'fōs), n. A transformation; metamorphosis. [Rare.]

Metamorphoser (met-a-mor'fōs-er), n. One that transforms or changes the shape.

Metamorphosis (met-a-mor'fōs-ik), a. Changing the form; transforming. 'The metamorphosis fables of the ancients.' T. Pownall.

Metamorphosis (met-a-mor'fōs-is), n. [Gr. metamorphōsis, from metamorphōō, to transform—meta, denoting change, and morphē, form, shape.] 1. The result of metamorphic action; any change of form, shape, or structure; transformation. —2. A marked change in the form or function of a living body; a transformation resulting from development; specifically, in zool. the alterations which an animal undergoes after its exclusion from the egg, and which alter extensively the general form and life of the individual. All the changes which are undergone by a butterfly in passing from the fecundated ovum to the imago, or perfect insect, constitute its development—each change, from ovum to larva, from larva to pupa, and from pupa to imago, constituting a metamorphosis. The preliminary or embryonic changes undergone within the egg, and which evenuate in its giving birth to a larva or caterpillar, are, by way of distinction, sometimes comprised under the term transformation. —metamorphosis of organs, in bot. the adaptation of one and the same organ to several different purposes, connected with which are changes in size, colour, and other particulars. Thus, all the parts of a plant are reducible to the axis and its appendages, the other parts developing themselves from these progressively. See MORPHOLOGY. —3. In chem. a term employed by Liebig to denote that chemical action by which a given compound is caused, by the presence of a peculiar substance, to resolve itself into two or more compounds, as sugar, by the presence of yeast, into alcohol and carbonic acid.

Metamorphostical (met-a-mor'fōs-ti-kal), a. Pertaining to or effected by metamorphosis. Page.

Metapexis (met-a-pep'sis), n. [Gr. meta, over, beyond, and pepōō, to boil.] In geol.

that kind of metamorphism affecting large tracts and appearing to be chiefly due to wet heat, that is, to boiling water or steam under high pressure.

The great mass of Galway granite was produced out of Cambro-Silurian rocks by intense metapexis. Kinahan.

Metaphor (met'a-fēr), n. [Gr. metaphora, from metapherōō to transfer—meta, over, and pherōō, to carry.] A figure of speech founded on the resemblance which one object is supposed to bear, in some respect, to another, and by which a word is transferred from an object to which it properly belongs to another in such a manner that a comparison is implied, though not formally expressed; a simile without any word expressing comparison; a short simile. Thus, 'that man is a fox,' is a metaphor; but 'that man is like a fox,' is a simile or comparison. In metaphor the similitude is contained in the name; a man is a fox, means, a man is as crafty as a fox. So we say, a man bridles his anger, that is, restrains it as a bridle restrains a horse; beauty awakens love or tender passions; opposition arouses courage. —Simile, Metaphor, Allegory, Parable. See under SIMILE.

Metaphoric, Metaphorical (met-a-for'ik, met-a-for'ik-al), a. Pertaining to metaphor; comprising a metaphor; not literal; as, a metaphorical use of words; a metaphorical expression.

The expression 'applying capital' is, of course, metaphorical; what is really applied is labour, capital being an indispensable condition. J. S. Mill.

Metaphorically (met-a-for'ik-al-ly), adv. In a metaphorical manner; not literally.

Metaphoricalness (met-a-for'ik-al-ness), n. The state or quality of being metaphorical.

Metaphorist (met'a-fēr-ist), n. One that makes metaphors.

Let the poet send to the metaphorist for his allegories. Arbutnot and Pope.

Metaphosphate (met-a-fōs'fāt), n. [Prefix meta, and phosphate.] A salt formed by the union of metaphosphoric acid with a base.

Metaphosphoric (met-a-fōs-for'ik), a. [Prefix meta, and phosphoric.] Pertaining to, produced from, or resembling phosphorus or phosphoric acid. —Metaphosphoric acid, a dry flaky acid obtained by burning phosphorus under a bell-glass filled with air or oxygen; protohydrated phosphoric acid (H₂O.P₂O₅).

Metaphrase, Metaphrasis (met'a-frāz, met-a-frā-zia), n. [Gr. metaphrasis—meta, over, according to or with, and phrasis, phrase.] 1. A verbal translation; a version or translation of one language into another, word for word. It stands opposed to paraphrase.

The translation is not so loose as paraphrase, nor so close as metaphrase. Dryden.

2. A phrase replying to another; a repartee.

I'm somewhat dull, still, in the manly art Of phrase and metaphrase. E. B. Browning.

Metaphrast (met'a-frast), n. A person who translates from one language into another, word for word.

Metaphrastic, Metaphrastical (met-a-fras'tik, met-a-fras'tik-al), a. Close or literal in translation.

Metaphrenon (met-a-frē'nōn), n. [Gr. meta, behind, and phrēn, the midriff.] In anat. the posterior part of the trunk, extending from the inferior and posterior part of the neck as far as the loins.

Metaphysic, Metaphysical (met-a-fiz'ik, met-a-fiz'ik-al), a. [See METAPHYSICS.] 1. Pertaining or relating to metaphysics; abstract; general; existing only in thought, and not in reality.

He knew what's what, and that's as high As metaphysic wit can fly. Hudibras.

According to some acceptations of the word metaphysical, which seem to make it synonymous with transcendental, and referable solely to the operations of pure reason, to the rejection of whatever is founded in experiment, none of Hume's works are properly metaphysical; and by the very foundation he has given to his philosophy he has made it empirical, and consequently not metaphysical. The word metaphysical is, however, here used in its ordinary, and, as it may be termed, popular acceptance, and as applicable to any attempt to analyze mind or describe its elements—a subject in relation to which the word ontology is also sometimes used. J. H. Burton.

2. According to rules or principles of metaphysics; as, metaphysical reasoning.

Of the whole movement of metaphysical science we have already pointed out Bacon and Descartes, as the founders. J. D. Morril.

3. † Preternatural or supernatural.

Which fate and metaphysical aid doth seek To have thee crowned withal. Shak.

Metaphysic (met-a-fiz'ik), n. Metaphysica.

Philosophy, that lead'd on heaven before,
Shrinks to her second cause, and is no more;
Physic metaphysic begs defence,
And metaphysic calls for aid, on sense. Pope.

Metaphysically (met-a-fiz'ik-ly), adv. In a metaphysical manner.

Metaphysician (met-a-fiz'ik-shan), n. One who is versed in the science of metaphysics.

Metaphysico-theological (met-a-fiz'ik-thé-ô-lôj'ik-al), a. Embracing metaphysics and theology.

Metaphysics (met-a-fiz'iks), n. [Gr. meta, after, and physica, physics, from physis, nature. It is said that this name was given to the science by Aristotle or his followers, who considered the science of natural bodies or physics the first in the order of studies, and the science of mind or intelligence to be the second.] A word first applied to a certain group of the philosophical dissertations of Aristotle which were placed in a collection of his manuscripts after his treatise on physics. As since employed, it has had various significations. It was appropriated to the ontology and pneumatology of the schoolmen, but latterly it has been understood as applying to all inquiries which seek to trace the branches of human knowledge to their first principles in the constitution of our nature. In the part of the Aristotelian treatise alluded to the problems were concerned with the contemplation of being as being, and the attributes which belong to it as such. This implies that things in general must be divided into beings or things as they are, and into phenomena or things as they appear. In modern usage metaphysics is very frequently held as applying to the former division, that is to the ultimate grounds of being. To attain this end it takes into account the correlative of being, that is, knowledge; and of knowledge not as coming within the province of logic or of mental philosophy, but as it is in relation to being or objective reality. In this respect metaphysics is synonymous with ontology. The science has also been considered as synonymous with psychology, or the second division, and to denote that branch of philosophy which investigates the faculties, operations, and laws of the human mind. Regarding the science in its most general sense, Mansel proposes the following definition:—'Metaphysics, or the philosophy of the facts of consciousness considered subjectively in relation to the mind knowing, and objectively in relation to the things known,' and thus dividing itself naturally into the two branches of psychology and ontology. On the other hand, Ferrier in his Institutes of Metaphysics occupies himself solely with the questions connected with knowledge, or the nature of our perception of an external world.

He (Descartes) established the fundamental principle, which we regard as the corner-stone of all the metaphysics of modern Europe, namely, that as natural science is based upon inductions drawn from the actual observation of the world without, so metaphysical science is based upon inductions similarly drawn from reflection upon the world within. J. D. Morrell.

Metaphysis (me-taf'iz'is), n. [Gr. meta, after, and physis, nature.] Change of form; transformation; metamorphosis.

Metaplasma (met-a-plaz'm), n. [Gr. metaplasmos, transformation—meta, over, and plasseō, to form.] In gram. a change or transmutation in a word by adding, transposing, or retrenching a syllable or letter.

Metaplast (met-a-plast), n. In gram. a word or the stem of a word exhibiting the change of metaplasma.

Metapodium (met-a-pô'di-um), n. [Gr. meta, after, and pous, podos, a foot.] In zool. the posterior lobe of the foot in mollusca, often called the operculigenous lobe, because it develops the operculum when this structure is present.

Metapophysis (met-a-pôf'iz'is), n. [Gr. meta, after, and apophysis, a process.] In anat. an exogenous process of the vertebrae. These processes are very largely developed in the armadillo, assisting in the support of its carapace or defensive covering.

Metapoptosis (met-ap'ôp'tô'sis), n. [Gr. meta, denoting change, and pôsis, a falling.] In pathol. any change in a disease in regard to its nature or seat; transformation.

Metasoma, Metasoma (met-a-sô'm, met-a-sô'ma), n. [Gr. meta, after, and sôma, the body.] In compar. anat. the posterior portion of the body of a cephalopod, consisting of a soft membranous mass enveloped by the mantle and containing the viscera.

Metastasis (me-tas'ta-sis), n. [Gr. metastasis—meta, over, and stasis, a placing, state, position, from hístēmi, to stand, to make to stand.] In pathol. a translation or removal of a disease from one part to another; any change in the former seat of a disease; also the change that takes place when the menstrual flow appears from other organs.

Metastatic (met-a-sta'tik), a. Relating to metastasis.

Metastoma (met-a-stô'ma), n. [Gr. meta, after, and stoma, the mouth.] The plate which closes the mouth posteriorly in the Crustacea.

Metatarsal (met-a-târ'sal), a. [From metatarsus.] Belonging to the metatarsus; as, a metatarsal bone.

Metatarsus (met-a-târ'sus), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, and tarsos, tarsus.] The middle of the foot, or part between the ankle and the toes; the bones coming between the tarsus and the digits in the hind foot of the higher vertebrates. See FOOT.

Metathesis (me-tath'é-sis), n. [Gr. metathesis—meta, over, and tithēmi, to set.] 1. In gram. transposition, more especially of the letters, sounds, or syllables of a word, as in the case of A. Sax. accean, accian—E. ack; A. Sax. bird or brîd—E. bird.—2. In med. a change in place of a morbid substance; an operation removing a morbid agent from one part to another, as in couching for cataract.

Metathetic, Metathetical (met-a-thet'ik, met-a-thet'ik-al), a. Relating to or containing metathesis.

Metathorax (met-a-thô'raks), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, and thôrax, the chest.] In entom. the third and last segment of the thorax, the second being called mesothorax.

Metatome (met-a-tôm), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, after, between, and tomē, a cutting, from temno, to cut.] In arch. the space between two dentils.

Metayer (me-tâ-yêr), n. [Fr. metayer, L.L. medietarius, from mediatus, state of being in the middle, middle place, from medius, middle.] A cultivator who tills the soil for a landholder on condition of receiving a share, generally a half of its produce, the owner furnishing the whole or part of the stock, tools, &c.

Vast estates accumulated by one proprietor, and cultivated by slaves, or at best by poor metayers. Milman.

The word is often used in the phrase metayer system, applied to that mode of land cultivation, practised chiefly in France and Italy, in which the land is cultivated by metayers.

The principle of the metayer system is that the labourer or peasant makes his engagement with the landowner, and pays, not a fixed rent, either in money or in kind, but a certain proportion of the produce, or rather, what remains of the produce, after deducting what is considered necessary to keep up the stock. The proportion is usually, as the name imports, one-half; but in several districts in Italy it is two-thirds. Respecting the supply of stock, the custom varies from place to place; in some places the landlord furnishes the whole, in others half, in others some particular part, as for instance the cattle and seed, the labourer providing the implements. J. S. Mill.

Metazoa (met-a-zô'a), n. pl. [Gr. meta, after, and zôon, a living being.] One of the two great sections into which Huxley divides the animal kingdom, the other being the Protozoa. The Metazoa are distinguished from the Protozoa in that the substance of the body is differentiated into histogenetic elements, that is to say, into cells. In all the Metazoa the germ has the form of a nucleated cell, the first step in the process of development being the production of a blastoderm by the subdivision of that cell, the cells of the blastoderm giving rise in turn to the histological elements of the adult body. With the exception of certain parasites, and the extremely modified males of a few species, all these animals possess a permanent alimentary cavity, lined by a special layer of cells. Sexual reproduction always occurs, and very generally the male element has the form of filiform spermatozoa. The lowest term in the series of the Metazoa is represented by the Porifera or sponges. That portion of the Metazoa which possesses a notochord, and in the adult state have the trunk divided into segments or myotomes, constitute the sub-kingdom Vertebrata: the rest are invertebrate.

Metâ (mêt), v.t. pret. and pp. meted; ppr.

meting. [A. Sax. metan, D. meten, Goth. mitan, G. messen, to measure; Icel. meta, to value; from a root seen also in L. modus, a measure (whence E. mode), moderare, to moderate, metior, to measure; Gr. metron, a measure; Skr. md, to measure.] 1. To measure; to ascertain the quantity, dimensions, or capacity of by any rule or standard.

Thy memory
Shall as a pattern or a measure live
By which his grace must met the lives of others. Shak.

Hence—2.† To measure with the eye; to aim.

Let the mark have a prick in't to met at. Shak.

3. To be the exact measure or equivalent of; to represent exactly; to accurately define or express. [Poetical.]

Alas, me! alas,
Who have undone myself from all that best,
Fairest and sweetest, to this wretchedness,
Saddest and most defiled—cast out, cast down—
What word *met*s absolute loss! E. B. Browning.

Metâ (mêt), n. [A. Sax. met, met, metto, Icel. mjót, O.H.G. mez, G. mass, a measure, with which may be incorporated O.Fr. mette, a boundary mark, from L. meta, a goal.] Measure; limit; boundary: used chiefly in the plural in the phrase metes and bounds.

Metâ, a. [See METâ.] Meet; fitting; convenient. Chaucer.

Metâ, v.t. or t. To meet. Chaucer.

Metâ-borde, n. An eating-table. Chaucer.

Metecorn (mêt'korn), n. [See METâ.] A measure or portion of corn given by a lord to customary tenants as a reward and encouragement for labour and faithful service.

Metegavel (mêt'gâ-vel), n. [O.E. mete, food, and gavel, a tax.] A tribute or rent paid in victuals.

Metely, a. Proportionable. 'Metely mouth.' Chaucer.

Metempric, Metempricist (met-em-pr'ik, met-em-pr'ik-sist), n. One who believes in the metemprical or transcendental philosophy.

Metemprical (met-em-pr'ik-al), a. [Gr. meta, beyond, and emprica, experience, from en, in, and peira, trial experiment.] In metaph. beyond or outside of experience; not based on experience; transcendental; a priori: opposed to empirical or experiential.

The exclusion of all metemprical questions, the rejection of the metemprical method, is the cardinal position of the Positive Philosophy. G. H. Lewes.

Metempricism (met-em-pr'ik-sizm), n. In metaph. the system of philosophy based on a priori reasoning; transcendentalism (which see).

Metempsychose (me-tem'ps'i-kôz), v.t. [See METEMPSYCHOSIS.] To translate from one body to another, as the soul.

The souls of users after their death Lucian affirms to be metempsychosed, or translated into the bodies of asses, and there remain certain years for poor men to take their pennyworth out of them. Boscham.

Metempsychosis (me-tem'ps'i-kô'sis), n. [Gr. meta, denoting change, and empsychōō, to animate—en, in, and psychē, life, soul.] Transmigration; the passing of the soul of a man after death into some other animal body, a doctrine held by Pythagoras and his followers, and still prevailing in some parts of Asia, particularly in India.

The sages of old live again in us, and in opinions there is a metempsychosis. Glanville.

Metempsychosis (met-em-tô'sis), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, and empsychōō, a falling upon, from en, on, and psychē, a falling, from psiōō, to fall.] In chron. the solar equation necessary to prevent the new moon from happening a day too late, or the suppression of the bissextile once in 134 years. The opposite to this is the proempsychosis, or the addition of a day every 300 years and another every 2400 years.

Metensomatosis (me-ten-sô'ma-tô'sis), n. [Gr. the putting into another body—meta implying change, and enôsmatōsis, an embodying or incarnation, from en, in, and sôma, sômatos, the body.] The transference of the elements of one body into another body and their conversion into its substance, as by decomposition and assimilation. Metensomatosis is in some respects the analogue of metempsychosis. The latter word, however, implies no resolution into elements, and consequently no conversion.

Is it not indisputable that man's body . . . is composed of the very same materials, the same protein, and fats, and salines, and water, which constitute the inorganic world—which may unquestionably have served long ago as the dead material which was revived and utilised in the bodies of extinct creatures, and which may serve in endless metensoma- iosis (if the word, which has the authority of Clemens Alexandrinus, and which is now imperiously demanded by the wants of science, may be pardoned on the score of necessity) for we know not what organisms yet to come? Farrar.

Meteor (mê'tê-ôr), n. [Fr. météore, from Gr. météoros, raised from the ground—meta, beyond, and eôra, aîra, a thing suspended or hovering in the air, from aîro, to lift, raise up.] 1. Any phenomenon or appearance of a transitory nature which has its origin in the atmosphere, as whirlwinds, hail, rain, snow, halos, the rainbow, &c. Now generally used in the specific sense of—2. A transient fiery or luminous body seen in the atmosphere or in a more elevated region; an aerolite; a shooting-star.

The imperial ensign; which, full high advanced,
Shone like a meteor, streaming to the wind. Milton.

3. Fig. anything that transiently dazzles or strikes with wonder.

Meteorite (mê'tê-ôr-ik), a. 1. Pertaining to a meteor or meteors; having the nature of a meteor; consisting of meteors; as, meteoric stones; meteoric showers.—2. Fig. transiently or irregularly brilliant; flashing like a meteor.

Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of Shaftesbury (grandson of the first earl, the famous meteoric politician of the reign of Charles II.), was born in 1672 and died in 1713. Craik.

—Meteorite iron, iron as found in meteoric stones, usually combined with from 1 to 10 per cent. of nickel.—Meteorite stones, aerolites. See AEROLITE.—Meteorite showers, showers of shooting-stars occurring periodically, and especially in the months of August and November. The maximum brilliancy occurs every thirty-three years, and then sometimes for four years in succession there are showers of unusual magnitude.

Meteorical (mê'tê-ôr-ik-al), a. Same as Meteorite.

Meteorism (mê'tê-ôr-izm), n. In med. flatulent distension of the abdomen.

Meteorite (mê'tê-ôr-ik), n. A meteorolite.

Meteorize (mê'tê-ôr-iz), v. t. To take the form of a meteor; to ascend in vapours.

To end the dewy may meteorize and emit their finer spirits. Evelyn.

Meteorographic (mê'tê-ôr-ô-graf'ik), a. Pertaining to meteorography.

Meteorography (mê'tê-ôr-ô-gra-fî), n. [Gr. météoron, a meteor, and graphê, description.] Meteorology; specifically, the registration of meteorological phenomena.

Meteorolite (mê'tê-ôr-ol-ik), n. [Gr. météoros, high in air, and lithos, a stone.] A meteoric stone; a stone or solid compound of earthy and metallic matter which falls to the earth from space. Called also Aerolite. See AEROLITE.

Meteorologic, Meteorological (mê'tê-ôr-ô-lôj'ik, mê'tê-ôr-ô-lôj'ik-al), a. Pertaining to the atmosphere and its phenomena; relating to the science of meteorology. Meteorological table or register, an account of the state of the air and its temperature, weight, dryness, or moisture, winds, &c., ascertained by the barometer, thermometer, hygrometer, anemometer, and other meteorological instruments.

Meteorologist (mê'tê-ôr-ô-lô-jist), n. A person skilled in meteors; one who studies the phenomena of meteors or keeps a register of them.

Meteorology (mê'tê-ôr-ô-lô-jî), n. [Gr. météorologia (ta) météora, celestial phenomena, from météoros, high in air, and logos, discourse. See METEOR.] The science which treats of atmospheric phenomena, more especially as connected with or in relation to weather and climate.

Meteoromancy (mê'tê-ôr-ô-man-sî), n. [Gr. météoron, a meteor, and mantia, divination.] A species of divination by meteoric phenomena, chiefly by thunder and lightning, held in high estimation by the Romans.

Meteoroscope (mê'tê-ôr-ô-skôp), n. [Gr. météoron, a celestial body, and skopos, to observe.] An instrument formerly in use for taking the apparent magnitude and the angular distances of heavenly bodies.

Meteoroscopy (mê'tê-ôr-ô-skô-plî), n. The taking of observations with the meteoroscope.

Meteorous (mê'tê-ôr-us), a. Having the nature of a meteor.

The cherubim descended; on the ground
Gliding meteorous, as evening mist
Risen from a river. Milton.

Meter (mê'têr), n. [From metrô.] One who or that which measures; chiefly used in compounds, or with adjectives, as in coal-meter, land-meter, gas-meter, water-meter, hydraulic meter, but often separately in the sense of a gas-meter.

Meter (mê'têr), n. Same as Metrus.

Meterage (mê'têr-âj), n. The act of measuring.

Meterer (mê'têr-êr), n. One who writes in metre; a poet. Drayton.

Meta-stick (mê'tastik), n. Naut. a stick fixed on a board at right angles, to measure the height of the hold of a ship, and to level the ballast.

Meta-wand (mê'twond), n. A staff or rod of a certain length used as a measure.

The degree of his moral guilt is not the true index or meta-wand of his condemnation. Coleridge.

Meta-yard (mê'tyârd), n. A yard, staff, or rod used as a measure.

Give me thy meta-yard, and spare not me. Shak.

Metheglin (mê-theg'lin), n. [W. meddyglyn—medd, mead, and glyn, liquor.] A liquor made of honey and water boiled and fermented, often enriched with spices.

Metinks (mê-thingks), v. impers. pp. metought. [A. Sax. me, dat. of first pers. pron., and the impersonal verb thyncean, to seem, to appear; comp. meeseem.] It seems to me; it appears to me; I think. [Chiefly used in poetry and elevated prose.]

By Heaven, metinks it were an easy leap,
To pluck bright honour from the pale-fac'd moon. Shak.

See THINK, to seem.

Method (meth'od), n. [Fr. méthode; Gr. metodos—meta, after, and odos, a way.] 1. A way or mode by which we proceed to the attainment of some aim; mode or manner of procedure; often used of a scientific or logical manner of procedure; as, there are two methods of accomplishing this, which method will you employ? there is a method proper to every department in philosophy.

For Bacon we claim the decided superiority in comprehensiveness of mind. He alone seemed to take in at one glance the whole circumference of human knowledge; he alone knew how to assign to each separate branch its proper position, to detect the prejudices by which it was impeded, and to furnish the true method by which advancement in every case was to be made. J. D. McCall.

2. (No pl.) (a) Logical or scientific arrangement or mode of procedure; the art of disposing well a series of many thoughts either for the discovering of truth when we are ignorant of it, or for proving it to others when it is already known. Fleming. (b) In ordinary language, systematic or orderly procedure; system; action regulated by rules; as, without method business of any kind will fall into confusion; to carry on farming to advantage, to keep accounts correctly, &c., method is indispensable.

Though this be madness, yet there's method in't. Shak.

3. In nat. hist. principle of classification; as, the method of Ray; the Linnean method. SYN. Order, regularity, rule, mode, course, means, system.

Methodic (meth'od-ik), a. Same as Methodical.

Methodical (meth'od-ik-al), a. Characterized by or exhibiting method; possessing a systematic disposition or arrangement; systematic; orderly; as, the methodical arrangement of the parts of a discourse or of arguments; a methodical treatise; methodical accounts.

Methodically (meth'od-ik-al-lî), adv. In a methodical manner; according to natural or convenient order.

Methodics (meth'od-iks), n. The science of method; methodology.

Methodism (meth'od-izm), n. The doctrines and worship of the sect of Christians called Methodists.

Methodist (meth'od-ist), n. 1. One characterized by strict adherence to method; specifically, one of a sect of ancient physicians who practised by method or theory.

The opposite extreme was adopted by another sect, who, rejecting observation, founded their doctrine exclusively on reasoning and theory, and these called themselves apothecians, or the methodists. Str. W. Hamilton.

2. A person who lives in the exact observance of religious duties; generally used in contempt or irony as a synonym for a sanctimonious person or a hypocrite.—3. One of a sect of Christians founded by John Wesley, so called from the fact that the name was applied to Wesley and his companions by their fellow-students at Oxford, on account of the exact regularity of their lives, and the strictness of their observance of religious duties.

Methodistic (meth'od-ist'ik), a. Same as Methodistical.

Methodistical (meth'od-ist'ik-al), a. Relating to method or the Methodists; resembling the Methodists; partaking of the strictness of Methodists; sometimes used ironically or contemptuously in the sense of Burns' unco guid.

Then spare our stage, ye methodistic men. Byron.

Methodistically (meth'od-ist'ik-al-lî), adv. In a methodistical manner.

Methodization (meth'od-iz-â'shon), n. The act or process of methodizing or reducing to method; the state of being methodized.

The conceptions, then, which we employ for the colligation and methodization of facts, do not develop themselves from within, but are impressed upon the mind from without. J. S. Mill.

Methodize (meth'od-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. methodized; ppp. methodizing. To reduce to method; to dispose in due order; to arrange in a convenient manner.

One who brings with him any observations he has made in reading the poets, will find his own reflections methodized and explained in the works of a good critic. Spectator.

Methodizer (meth'od-iz-êr), n. One who methodizes.

Methodology (meth'od-ô-lô-jî), n. [Gr. metodos, method, and logos, discourse.] The science of method or of classification; a discourse concerning method.

Haller, whose reputation in physiology was as great as that of Linnæus in methodology, rejected it as too merely artificial. W. Keell.

Methought (mê-thât), pret. of metinks. It seemed to me; I thought.

Methought I saw my late espoused saint Brought to me, like Alcecis, from the grave. Milton.

Methyle (meth'ül), n. Same as Methyl.

Methyl (meth'il), n. [Gr. meta, after, with, and hylê, wood.] (CH₃). The name given to the hypothetical radical of wood spirit and its combinations. It is analogous to ethyl in its chemical characters.

Methylal (meth'il-al), n. (C₂H₅O₂). A liquid product of the oxidation of methylic alcohol.

Methylamine (me-thil'-a-min), n. (CH₃N). A colourless gas having a strong ammoniacal odour, and resembling ammonia in many of its reactions. When brought in contact with a lighted taper it burns with a livid yellowish flame. Methylamine may be condensed to a liquid; it has not been solidified. It is exceedingly soluble in water.

Methylated (meth'il-â-ted), a. Impregnated or mixed with methyl.—Methylated spirit, spirit of wine containing 10 per cent. of wood naphtha (methylic alcohol). The naphtha communicates a disagreeable flavour, which renders it unfit for drinking, and for this reason it is admitted duty free. It is of much use in the arts as a solvent, for preserving specimens, in manufacture of varnishes, for burning in spirit-lamps, &c.

Methylene (meth'il-ên), n. [See METHYL.] (CH₂). A hypothetical hydro-carbon.

Methylic (me-thil'ik), a. Pertaining to or produced from methyl.—Methylic alcohol, alcohol obtained by the destructive distillation of wood.—Methylic ether ((CH₃)₂O), oxide of methyl, a colourless gas.

Metic (mê'tik), n. [Gr. metekos, changing one's abode, emigrating and settling elsewhere—meta, denoting change, and oikos, a house, dwelling.] In ancient Greece, a sojourner; a resident stranger in a Grecian city or place.

Metier (mê-tê-â), n. [Fr.] Profession; specialty; rôle.

Metiz (mê'tiz), n. [Fr. metiz, from a L.L. mizivius, from L. miztus, pp. of miscere, to mix.] A half-breed between a white and a quarteroon.

Metis (mê'tis), n. [In Greek mythology the personification of prudence, the daughter of Oceanus and Thetys.] One of the small planets or asteroids, between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, discovered by Mr. Graham, an Irish astronomer, April 25, 1848. It revolves round the sun in 1345.85 solar days, and is about two and a half times the distance of the earth from the sun.

Metoché (mê'tô-kê), n. [Gr. metochê, a sharing, from metechô, to share, to divide—meta, with, and echô, to have.] In arch. the interval between the dentils in the Ionic entablature.

Metolale (me-tō-lē'ik), a. [Gr. meta, beyond, after, and E oleic.] A name applied to an acid produced by the action of sulphuric acid on oleic acid. It is a liquid.

Metonic (mē-ton'ik), a. Pertaining to Meton, an ancient Athenian astronomer. — Metonic cycle, metonic year, the cycle of the moon, or period of nineteen years, in which the lunations of the moon return to the same days of the month: discovered by Meton.

Metonymic, Metonymical (mēt-ō-nim'ik, mēt-ō-nim'ik-al), a. [See Metonymy.] Pertaining to metonymy; used by way of metonymy.

Metonymically (mēt-ō-nim'ik-al-ly), adv. By metonymy.

Metonymy (mē-ton'i-mi), n. [Gr. metonymia — meta, denoting change, and onoma, a name.] In rhet. a trope in which one word is put for another on account of some actual relation between the things signified, as when we substitute the effect for the cause, the author for his writings, the inventor for the thing invented, &c.; as when we say, 'We read Virgil,' that is, his poems or writings. 'They have Moses and the prophets,' that is, their books or writings. A man has a clear head, that is, understanding, intellect; a warm heart, that is, affections.

Metopæ (mēt-ō-pē), n. [Gr. metopæ — meta, with, between, and opē, an aperture or hollow.] In arch. the space between the triglyphs of the Doric frieze. See TRIGLYPH.

Metoposcopy, Metoposcopical (mēt-ō-pōs-kop'ik, mēt-ō-pōs-kop'ik-al), a. Relating to metoposcopy.

Metoposcopist (mēt-ō-pōs-kō-pist), n. One versed in metoposcopy or physiognomy.

Metoposcopy (mēt-ō-pōs-kō-pi), n. [Gr. metopē, the forehead, and skopēō, to view.] The study of physiognomy; the art of discovering the character or the dispositions of men by their features or the lines of the face.

Mètre (mē'tre), n. [Lit. 'measure,' pl. of Gr. metron, a measure.] An ingenious pocket instrument, combining a thermometer, clinometer, goniometer, level, magnifying lens, measure for wire gauge, plummet, platina scales, anemometer, &c., by which the temperature, direction, and dip of rocks, the angles of cleavage and crystallization, the level of workings, the latitude, &c., can be determined.

Mètre (mē'ter), n. [Fr. mètre, L. metrum, Gr. metron, a measure. Akin metre (which see).] Rhythmical arrangement of syllables into verses, stanzas, strophes, &c.; rhythm; measure; verse.

Rhyme being no necessary adjunct or true ornament of poem or good verse, in longer works especially, but the invention of a barbarous age to set off wretched matter and lame mètre. Milton.

Mètre, Mètre (mē'ter; Fr. pron. mē-tr), n. A French measure of length, equal to 59.37 English inches, the standard of linear measure, being the ten millionth part of the distance from the equator to the North Pole, as ascertained by actual measurement of an arc of the meridian.

Metrical (mē'trik), a. Same as Metrical. 'Healed with his metric fragments of rustic wisdom.' Prof. Blackie.

Metrical (mē'trik), a. [Fr. métrique; L. metricus, Gr. metrikos, from metron, a measure.] Pertaining to the system of weights and measures first adopted in France, but gradually coming into use in other countries. It involves two important points: first, that the units of length, superficies, solidity, and weight are all correlated; and second, the multiplication or subdivision of the unit according to a uniform decimal notation. The multiples of the different units are indicated by prefixing Greek names of numbers to the name of the unit, the subdivisions by prefixing Latin names of numbers. These prefixes are, therefore, for decimal multiples, deca-, hecto- (or hect-), kilo-, and myrio-; and for decimal subdivisions they are, deci-, centi-, and milli-. Thus for linear measurement we have the mètre; its multiples, the décamètre (ten mètres), the hectomètre (one hundred mètres), the kilomètre (one thousand mètres), and the myriomètre (ten thousand mètres); and its subdivisions, the décimètre (one tenth of a mètre), the centimètre (one hundredth of a mètre), and the millimètre (one thousandth of a mètre). See MÈTRE.

Metrical (mē'trik-al), a. [L. metricus; Fr. métrique.] 1. Pertaining to measuring; employed in measuring; as, the yard is the English metrical unit of length. — 2. Pertaining to rhythm or measure.

Let any the best painters of them all compose a hymn in metrical form. Jer. Taylor.

3. Consisting of verse; composed in rhythmic form; as, metrical compositions. 'Metrical romances.' T. Warton.

Metrical (mē'trik-al-ly), adv. In a metrical manner; according to poetic measure.

Metricalian (mē'trik-shan), n. Same as Metrist.

Metricalian, n. A writer in verse. Chaucer.

Metricalization (mē'trik-shā'zhon), n. The act of making verses. Tennyson.

Metrist (mē'tri-ist), n. A metrist; a versifier.

Metrist (mē'trist), n. A composer of verses.

Metochrome (mē'trō-krom), n. [Gr. metron, a measure, and chroma, colour.] An instrument for measuring colours.

Metograph (mē'trō-graf), n. [Gr. metron, a measure, and graphō, to write.] An apparatus on a railway engine which measures and records the rate of speed at any moment, and the time of arrival and departure at each station.

Metology (mē'trō-lō-jī), n. [Gr. metron, measure, and logos, discourse.] 1. An account of weights and measures. — 2. The art and science of mensuration.

Metomania (mē'trō-mā'nī-a), n. [Gr. metron, a measure, and mania, madness.] An immoderate eagerness for writing verses.

Metronome (mē'trō-nōm), n. [Gr. metron, measure, and nomos, a law.] An instrument, consisting of a pendulum, set in motion by clock-work; invented and introduced in Austria about the year 1814, for the purpose of determining, by its vibrations, the movement, that is, the quickness or slowness, of musical compositions. There is a sliding weight attached to the pendulum rod, by the shifting of which up or down the vibrations may be made slower or quicker. A scale indicates the number of audible beats given per minute.

Maelzel's Metronome.

The dotted lines show the extent of vibration of the pendulum.

Metronomy (mē-tron'ō-mi), n. [See Metronome.] The measuring of musical time by an instrument called the metronome.

Metronymic (mē'trō-nim'ik), a. and a. [Gr. metronymikos — metēr, metros, a mother, and onoma, a name.] A term applied to a name derived from a mother or other near female ancestor, as opposed to patronymic.

Metropolis (mē'trō-pō-lis), n. [Gr. metropolis — metēr, metros, a mother, and polis, a city; it properly meant a mother-city, a city in relation to colonies it had sent out.] 1. The chief city or capital of a kingdom, state, or country, as Paris in France, Madrid in Spain, London in Great Britain. — 2. The shop. 'Stood the great metropolis.' n. 1. Being in the chief. 2. Ecceles hav-politan; pro-

n. 1. Orimetropolis or

The precedence in each province was assigned to the bishop of the metropolis, who was called the first bishop, the metropolitan. Barrow.

2. Ecceles a bishop having authority over the other bishops of a province; an archbishop.

The archbishops of Canterbury and York are both metropolitans. Hook.

3. In the Greek Ch. the title of a dignitary intermediate between patriarchs and archbishops.

Metropolitanate (mē'trō-pō-lī-tan-āt), n. The office or see of a metropolitan bishop.

As his wife she (Helena) closed against him (Abelard) that ascending ladder of ecclesiastical honours, the priory, the abbacy, the bishopric, the metropolitanate, the cardinalate, and even that which was beyond and above all. Milman.

Metropolitæ (mē'trō-pō-lī), a. A metropolitan.

Metropolitæ, Metropolitici (mē'trō-pō-lī-tik, mē'trō-pō-lī-tik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to a metropolitan; metropolitan. — 2. Ecceles, pertaining to a metropolitan. 'A metropolitan power over the whole island of Crete.' Abp. Sanerft.

Metroscope (mē'trō-skōp), n. [Gr. metra, the uterus, and skopēō, to observe.] An instrument for listening to the sounds made by the heart of the fetus in the womb when they are imperceptible through the walls of the abdomen. Dunthorn.

Metrosideros (mē'trō-sī-dē'ros), n. [Gr.

Metrosideros vera (Iron-wood).

mētra, the heart of a tree, and sīdēros, iron.) A genus of climbing trees and shrubs, nat. order Myrtaceæ, for the most part natives of the islands of the Pacific. M. vera (true iron-wood) is a tree, a native of Java and Amboyna. Of the wood of this tree the Chinese and Japanese make rudders, anchors, &c., for their ships and boats. The bark is used in Japan as a remedy in dysentery, diarrhoea, and mucous discharges. M. polymorpha grows in the Sandwich Islands, and is said to be the plant from which are made the clubs and other weapons used in warfare by the South Sea Islanders. M. robusta is the tree of New Zealand, where it is employed in ship-building and in other ways. The trees of this genus have thick, opposite, entire leaves, and heads of showy red or white flowers.

Metrotome (mē'trō-tōm), n. [Gr. metra, the womb, and tomos, a cutting, from temnō, to cut.] In surg. an instrument used to divide the neck of the uterus.

Metroxylon (mē'trōk-sī-lon), n. [Gr. metra, the heart of a tree, and xylon, wood.] A genus of plants, now known as Sagrus. See SAGO.

Mette, † Met, † pret. of the obs. verb meten (A. Sax. metan), to dream. 'The lover mette he hath his lady wonne.' Chaucer. It is often used impersonally, me mette, signifying I dreamed.

Mettle (met'l), n. [Merely an altered spelling of metel, which was formerly used in the same sense, though each has now distinctive applications of its own.] 1. Staff; material; moral or physical constitution.

Every man living shall assuredly meet with an hour of temptation, a certain critical hour, which shall move especially try what mettle his heart is made of. South.

2. Disposition; character; temper; spirit; constitutional ardour; courage; sprightliness; fire. 'Gentlemen of brave mettle.' Shak. 'A lad of mettle.' Shak.

The wisest counsel, like a generous horse, Shows most true mettle when you check his course. Pope.

They were all knights of mettle true, Kimmén to the cold Buccleuch. Sir W. Scott.

—To put a man on or to his mettle, to stimulate a man to do his utmost; to put a man in a position where he must do his utmost.

tures, and which may serve in endless metensoma- tosis (if the word, which has the authority of Clemens Alexandrinus, and which is now impudently demanded by the wants of science, may be pardoned on the score of necessity) for we know not what organisms yet to come! Farrar.

Meteor (mê'tê-ër), n. [Fr. météore, from Gr. metéōros, raised from the ground—meta, beyond, and eōra, aíra, a thing suspended or hovering in the air, from aíro, to lift, raise up.] 1. Any phenomenon or appearance of a transitory nature which has its origin in the atmosphere, as whirlwinds, hail, rain, snow, halos, the rainbow, &c. Now generally used in the specific sense of—2. A transient fiery or luminous body seen in the atmosphere or in a more elevated region; an aerolite; a shooting-star.

The imperial ensign; which, full high advanced, Shone like a meteor, streaming to the wind. Milton.

3. Fig. anything that transiently dazzles or strikes with wonder.

Meteorite (mê'tê-ôr-ik), a. 1. Pertaining to a meteor; or meteors; having the nature of a meteor; consisting of meteors; as, meteoric stones; meteoric showers.—2. Fig. transiently or irregularly brilliant; flashing like a meteor.

Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of Shaftesbury (grandson of the first earl, the famous meteoric politician of the reign of Charles II.), was born in 1671 and died in 1713. Craik.

—Meteorite iron, iron as found in meteoric stones, usually combined with from 1 to 10 per cent. of nickel.—Meteorite stones, aerolites. See AEROLITE.—Meteorite showers, showers of shooting-stars occurring periodically, and especially in the months of August and November. The maximum brilliancy occurs every thirty-three years, and then sometimes for four years in succession there are showers of unusual magnitude.

Meteorol (mê'tê-ôr-ik-al), a. Same as Meteorite.

Meteorism (mê'tê-ôr-izm), n. In med. flatulent distension of the abdomen.

Meteorite (mê'tê-ôr-it), n. A meteorolite.

Meteorize (mê'tê-ôr-iz), v. i. To take the form of a meteor; to ascend in vapours.

To the end the dew may meteorize and emit their finer spirits. Evelyn.

Meteorographic (mê'tê-ôr-ô-graf-ik), a. Pertaining to meteorography.

Meteorography (mê'tê-ôr-ô-gra-fî), n. [Gr. metéōron, a meteor, and graphô, description.] Meteorology; specifically, the registration of meteorological phenomena.

Meteorolite (mê'tê-ôr-ol-it), n. [Gr. metéōros, high in air, and lithos, a stone.] A meteoric stone; a stone or solid compound of earthy and metallic matter which falls to the earth from space. Called also Aerolite. See AEROLITE.

Meteorologic, Meteorological (mê'tê-ôr-ô-lôj-ik, mê'tê-ôr-ô-lôj-ik-al), a. Pertaining to the atmosphere and its phenomena; relating to the science of meteorology. Meteorological table or register, an account of the state of the air and its temperature, weight, dryness, or moisture, winds, &c., ascertained by the barometer, thermometer, hygrometer, anemometer, and other meteorological instruments.

Meteorologist (mê'tê-ôr-ô-lô-jist), n. A person skilled in meteors; one who studies the phenomena of meteors or keeps a register of them.

Meteorology (mê'tê-ôr-ô-lô-jî), n. [Gr. metéōrologia—(ta) metéōra, celestial phenomena, from metéōros, high in air, and logos, discourse. See METEOR.] The science which treats of atmospheric phenomena, more especially as connected with or in relation to weather and climate.

Meteoromancy (mê'tê-ôr-ô-man-sî), n. [Gr. metéōron, a meteor, and man-teia, divination.] A species of divination by meteoric phenomena, chiefly by thunder and lightning, held in high estimation by the Romans.

Meteoroscope (mê'tê-ôr-ô-skôp), n. [Gr. metéōron, a celestial body, and skôpeô, to observe.] An instrument formerly in use for taking the apparent magnitude and the angular distances of heavenly bodies.

Meteoroscopy (mê'tê-ôr-ô-skô-pî), n. The taking of observations with the meteoroscope.

Meteorous (mê'tê-ôr-us), a. Having the nature of a meteor.

The cherubim descended; on the ground Gliding meteors, as evening mist Risen from a river. Milton.

Meter (mê'têr), n. [From meto, one who or that which measures: chiefly used in compounds, or with adjectives, as in coal-meter, land-meter, gas-meter, water-meter, hydraulic meter, but often separately in the sense of a gas-meter.

Meter (mê'têr), n. Same as Metro.

Meterage (mê'têr-âj), n. The act of measuring.

Meterer (mê'têr-ër), n. One who writes in metre; a poet. Drayton.

Mete-stick (mê'têstik), n. Naut. a stick fixed on a board at right angles, to measure the height of the hold of a ship, and to level the ballast.

Mete-wand (mê'têwônd), n. A staff or rod of a certain length used as a measure.

The degree of his moral guilt is not the true index or mete-wand of his condemnation. Coleridge.

Mete-yard (mê'têyârd), n. A yard, staff, or rod used as a measure.

Take thou the bill, Give me thy mete-yard, and spare not me. Shak.

Metheglin (mê-theg'lin), n. [W. meddyglyn—medd, mead, and glyn, liquor.] A liquor made of honey and water boiled and fermented, often enriched with spices.

Metinks (mê-thingks'), v. impers. pp. metought. [A. Sax. me, dat. of first pers. pron., and the impersonal verb thyncean, to seem, to appear; comp. meeseem.] It seems to me; it appears to me; I think. [Chiefly used in poetry and elevated prose.]

By heaven, metinks it were an easy leap, To pluck bright honour from the pale-fac'd moon. Shak.

See THINK, to seem.

Method (meth'od), n. [Fr. méthode; Gr. metodos—meta, after, and odos, a way.] 1. A way or mode by which we proceed to the attainment of some aim; mode or manner of procedure; often used of a scientific or logical manner of procedure; as, there are two methods of accomplishing this, which method will you employ? there is a method proper to every department in philosophy.

For Bacon we claim the decided superiority in comprehensiveness of mind. He alone seemed to take in at one glance the whole circumference of human knowledge; he alone knew how to assign to each separate branch its proper position, to detect the prejudices by which it was impeded, and to furnish the true method by which advancement in every case was to be made. J. D. McNeill.

2. (No pl.) (a) Logical or scientific arrangement or mode of procedure; the art of disposing well a series of many thoughts either for the discovering of truth when we are ignorant of it, or for proving it to others when it is already known. Fleming. (b) In ordinary language, systematic or orderly procedure; system; action regulated by rules; as, without method business of any kind will fall into confusion; to carry on farming to advantage, to keep accounts correctly, &c., method is indispensable.

Though this be madness, yet there's method in't. Shak.

3. In nat. hist. principle of classification; as, the method of Ray; the Linnean method. Syn. Order, regularity, rule, mode, course, means, system.

Methodic (meth-od'ik), a. Same as Methodical.

Methodical (meth-od'ik-al), a. Characterized by or exhibiting method; possessing a systematic disposition or arrangement; systematic; orderly; as, the methodical arrangement of the parts of a discourse or of arguments; a methodical treatise; methodical accounts.

Methodically (meth-od'ik-al-ly), adv. In a methodical manner; according to natural or convenient order.

Methodics (meth-od'iks), n. The science of method; methodology.

Methodism (meth'od-izm), n. The doctrines and worship of the sect of Christians called Methodists.

Methodist (meth'od-ist), n. 1. One characterized by strict adherence to method; specifically, one of a sect of ancient physicians who practised by method or theory.

The opposite extreme was adopted by another sect, who, rejecting observation, founded their doctrine exclusively on reasoning and theory, and these called themselves apothecans, or the methodists. Sir W. Hamilton.

2. A person who lives in the exact observance of religious duties: generally used in contempt or irony as a synonym for a sanctimonious person or a hypocrite.—3. One of a sect of Christians founded by John Wesley, so called from the fact that the name was applied to Wesley and his companions by their fellow-students at Oxford, on account of the exact regularity of their lives, and the strictness of their observance of religious duties.

Methodistic (meth-od-ist'ik), a. Same as Methodistical.

Methodistical (meth-od-ist'ik-al), a. Relating to method or the Methodists; resembling the Methodists; partaking of the strictness of Methodists: sometimes used ironically or contemptuously in the sense of Burns' unco guid.

Then spare our stage, ye methodistic men. Byron.

Methodistically (meth-od-ist'ik-al-ly), adv. In a methodistical manner.

Methodization (meth'od-iz-â-shon), n. The act or process of methodizing or reducing to method; the state of being methodized.

The conceptions, then, which we employ for the colligation and methodization of facts, do not develop themselves from within, but are impressed upon the mind from without. J. S. Mill.

Methodize (meth'od-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. methodized; ppr. methodizing. To reduce to method; to dispose in due order; to arrange in a convenient manner.

One who brings with him any observations he has made in reading the poets, will find his own reflections methodized and explained in the works of a good critic. Spectator.

Methodizer (meth'od-iz-ër), n. One who methodizes.

Methodology (meth-od-ô-lô-jî), n. [Gr. metodos, method, and logos, discourse.] The science of method or of classification; a discourse concerning method.

Haller, whose reputation in physiology was as great as that of Linnæus in methodology, rejected it as too merely artificial. Whewell.

Methodought (mê-thât), pret. of metinks. It seemed to me; I thought.

Methodought I saw my late espoused saint Brought to me, like Alcibiades, from the grave. Milton.

Methule (meth'ül), n. Same as Methyl. Methyl (meth'il), n. [Gr. meta, after, with, and hylê, wood.] (CH_3). The name given to the hypothetical radical of wood spirit and its combinations. It is analogous to ethyl in its chemical characters.

Methylal (meth'il-al), n. ($\text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{O}$). A liquid product of the oxidation of methylalcohol.

Methylamine (meth'il-a-min), n. (CH_3N). A colourless gas having a strong ammoniacal odour, and resembling ammonia in many of its reactions. When brought in contact with a lighted taper it burns with a livid yellowish flame. Methylamine may be condensed to a liquid; it has not been solidified. It is exceedingly soluble in water.

Methylated (meth'il-ât-ed), a. Impregnated or mixed with methyl.—Methylated spirit, spirit of wine containing 10 per cent. of wood naphtha (methylalcohol). The naphtha communicates a disagreeable flavour, which renders it unfit for drinking, and for this reason it is admitted duty free. It is of much use in the arts as a solvent, for preserving specimens, in manufacture of varnishes, for burning in spirit-lamps, &c.

Methylene (meth'il-ên), n. [See METHYL.] (CH_2). A hypothetical hydro-carbon.

Methylic (me-thil'ik), a. Pertaining to or produced from methyl.—Methylic alcohol, alcohol obtained by the destructive distillation of wood.—Methylic ether ($\text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{O}$), oxide of methyl, a colourless gas.

Metic (mê'tik), n. [Gr. metikos, changing one's abode, emigrating and settling elsewhere—meta, denoting change, and oikos, a house, dwelling.] In ancient Greece, a sojourner; a resident stranger in a Grecian city or place.

Metier (mê-tê-sâ), n. [Fr.] Profession; speciality; rôle.

Metif (mê'tif), n. [Fr. metif, from a L.L. mixturus, from L. mixtus, pp. of miscere, to mix.] A half-breed between a white and a quarteroon.

Metis (mê'tis), n. [In Greek mythology the personification of prudence, the daughter of Oceanus and Thetys.] One of the small planets or asteroids, between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, discovered by Mr. Graham, an Irish astronomer, April 25, 1848. It revolves round the sun in 1845.66 solar days, and is about two and a half times the distance of the earth from the sun.

Metoché (mê'tô-kê), n. [Gr. metochê, a sharing, from metechô, to share, to divide—meta, with, and echô, to have.] In arch. the interval between the dentils in the Ionic entablature.

Metaleic (me-tô-lê'ik), a. [Gr. meta, beyond, after, and E oleic.] A name applied to an acid produced by the action of sulphuric acid on oleic acid. It is a liquid.

Metonic (mê-ton'ik), a. Pertaining to Meton, an ancient Athenian astronomer. — Metonic cycle, metonic year, the cycle of the moon, or period of nineteen years, in which the lunations of the moon return to the same days of the month: discovered by Meton.

Metonymic, Metonymical (met-ô-nim'ik, met-ô-nim'ik-al), a. [See Metonymy.] Pertaining to metonymy; used by way of metonymy.

Metonymically (met-ô-nim'ik-al-ly), adv. By metonymy.

Metonymy (me-ton'î-mî), n. [Gr. metonymia — meta, denoting change, and onoma, a name.] In rhet. a trope in which one word is put for another on account of some actual relation between the things signified, as when we substitute the effect for the cause, the author for his writings, the inventor for the thing invented, &c., as when we say, 'We read Virgil, that is, his poems or writings.' 'They have Moses and the prophets,' that is, their books or writings. A man has a clear head, that is, understanding, intellect; a warm heart, that is, affections.

Metopæ (mê-tô-pê), n. [Gr. metopæ — meta, with, between, and opê, an aperture or hollow.] In arch. the space between the triglyphs of the Doric frieze. See TRIGLYPH.

Metoposopic, Metoposopical (mê-tô-pos-ôp'ik, mê-tô-pos-ôp'ik-al), a. Relating to metoposcopy.

Metoposcopist (mê-tô-pos'ô-pist), n. One versed in metoposcopy or physiognomy.

Metoposcopy (mê-tô-pos'ô-pl), n. [Gr. metopon, the forehead, and skopos, to view.] The study of physiognomy; the art of discovering the character or the dispositions of men by their features or the lines of the face.

Métra (mê'tra), n. [Lit. 'measures,' pl. of Gr. metron, a measure.] An ingenious pocket instrument, combining a thermometer, clinometer, goniometer, level, magnifying lens, measure for wire gauze, plummet, platina scales, anemometer, &c., by which the temperature, direction, and dip of rocks, the angles of cleavage and crystallization, the level of workings, the latitude, &c., can be determined.

Mètre (mê'têr), n. [Fr. mètre, L. metrum, Gr. metron, a measure. Akin metre (which see).] Rhythmical arrangement of syllables into verses, stanzas, strophes, &c.; rhythm; measure; verse.

Rhyme being no necessary adjunct or true ornament of poem or good verse, in longer works especially, but the invention of a barbarous age to set off wretched matter and lame mètre. Aldrich.

Mètre, Mètre (mê'têr; Fr. pron. mâ-tr), n. A French measure of length, equal to 39.37 English inches, the standard of linear measure, being the ten millionth part of the distance from the equator to the North Pole, as ascertained by actual measurement of an arc of the meridian.

Metrical (mê'trik), a. Same as Metrical. 'Headed with his metrical fragments of rustic wisdom.' Prof. Blackie.

Metrical (mê'trik), a. [Fr. métrique; L. metricus, Gr. metricos, from metron, a measure.] Pertaining to the system of weights and measures first adopted in France, but gradually coming into use in other countries. It involves two important points: first, that the units of length, superficies, solidity, and weight are all correlated; and second, the multiplication or subdivision of the unit according to a uniform decimal notation. The multiples of the different units are indicated by prefixing Greek names of numbers to the name of the unit, the subdivisions by prefixing Latin names of numbers. These prefixes are, therefore, for decimal multiples, deca-, hecto- (or hect-), kilo-, and myrio-; and for decimal subdivisions they are, deci-, centi-, and milli-. Thus for linear measurement we have the mètre, its multiples, the décimètre (ten metres), the hectomètre (one hundred metres), the kilomètre (one thousand metres), and the myriomètre (ten thousand metres), and its subdivisions, the décimètre (one tenth of a metre), the centimètre (one hundredth of a metre), and the millimètre (one thousandth of a metre). See METRE.

Metrical (mê'trik-al), a. [L. metricus; Fr. métrique.] 1. Pertaining to measuring; employed in measuring; as, the yard is the English metrical unit of length. — 2. Pertaining to rhythm or measure.

Let any the best psalmist of them all compose a hymn in metrical form. Fer. Taylor.

3. Consisting of verse; composed in rhythmic form; as, metrical compositions. 'Metrical romances.' T. Warton.

Metrical (mê'trik-al-ly), adv. In a metrical manner; according to poetic measure.

Metricalian (mê'tri'shan), n. Same as Metrist.

Metricalian, n. A writer in verse. Chaucer.

Metricalization (mê'tri-fik-â'shon), n. The act of making verses. Tennyson.

Metrist (mê'tri-ô-er), n. A metrist; a versifier.

Metrist (mê'trist), n. A composer of verses.

Metochrome (mê'trô-krom), n. [Gr. metron, a measure, and chroma, colour.] An instrument for measuring colours.

Metograph (mê'trô-graf), n. [Gr. metron, a measure, and graphô, to write.] An apparatus on a railway engine which measures and records the rate of speed at any moment, and the time of arrival and departure at each station.

Metology (mê'trô-ô-ly), n. [Gr. metron, measure, and logos, discourse.] 1. An account of weights and measures. — 2. The art and science of mensuration.

Metomania (mê'trô-mâ-ni-a), n. [Gr. metron, a measure, and mania, madness.] An immoderate eagerness for writing verses.

Metronome (mê'trô-nôm), n. [Gr. metron, measure, and nomos, a law.] An instrument, consisting of a pendulum, set in motion by clock-work; invented and introduced in Austria about the year 1814, for the purpose of determining, by its vibrations, the movement, that is, the quickness or slowness, of musical compositions. There is a sliding weight attached to the pendulum rod, by the shifting of which up or down the vibrations may be made slower or quicker. A scale indicates the number of audible beats given per minute.

Musself's Metronome.

The dotted lines show the extent of vibration of the pendulum.

Metronomy (mê-trôn'ô-mî), n. [See Metronome.] The measuring of musical time by an instrument called the metronome.

Metronymic (mê'trô-nim'ik), n. and a. [Gr. metronymikos — mêter, mêtrô, a mother, and onoma, a name.] A term applied to a name derived from a mother or other near female ancestor, as opposed to patronymic.

Metropolis (mê'trô-pô-lis), n. [Gr. metropolis — mêter, mêtrô, a mother, and polis, a city: it properly meant a mother-city, a city in relation to colonies it had sent out.] 1. The chief city or capital of a kingdom, state, or country, as Paris in France, Madrid in Spain, London in Great Britain. — 2. The see or seat of a metropolitan bishop. 'Stood out against the holy church, the great metropolis and see of Rome.' Shak.

Metropolitan (mê'trô-pô-lî-tan), a. 1. Belonging to a metropolis; residing in the chief city or capital of a country. — 2. Eccles. having the authority of a metropolitan; proceeding from a metropolis.

Metropolitan (mê'trô-pô-lî-tan), n. 1. Originally, a bishop resident in a metropolis or the chief city of a province.

The precedence in each province was assigned to the bishop of the metropolis, who was called the first bishop, the metropolitan. Barrow.

2. Eccles. a bishop having authority over the other bishops of a province; an archbishop.

The archbishops of Canterbury and York are both metropolitans. Hook.

3. In the Greek Ch. the title of a dignitary intermediate between patriarchs and archbishops.

Metropolitane (mê'trô-pô-lî-tan-ê), n. The office or see of a metropolitan bishop.

As his wife she (Hielolai) closed against him (Abelard) that ascending ladder of ecclesiastical honours, the priory, the abbacy, the bishopric, the metropolitane, the cardinalate, and even that which was beyond and above all. Nitman.

Metropolite (mê'trô-pô-lî-t), n. A metropolitan.

Metropolitie, Metropolitocal (mê'trô-pô-lî-tik, mê'trô-pô-lî-tik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to a metropolis; metropolitane. — 2. Eccles. pertaining to a metropolitan. 'A metropolitocal power over the whole island of Crete.' Abp. Sanceret.

Metroscope (mê'trô-skôp), n. [Gr. mêtra, the uterus, and skopos, to observe.] An instrument for listening to the sounds made by the heart of the fetus in the womb when they are imperceptible through the walls of the abdomen. Dungham.

Metrosideros (mê'trô-sî-dê'rô-s), n. [Gr.

Metrosideros vera (Iron-wood).

mêtra, the heart of a tree, and sîdêros, iron.] A genus of climbing trees and shrubs, nat. order Myrtaceæ, for the most part natives of the islands of the Pacific. M. vera (true iron-wood) is a tree, a native of Java and Amboyna. Of the wood of this tree the Chinese and Japanese make rudders, anchors, &c., for their ships and boats. The bark is used in Japan as a remedy in dysentery, diarrhoea, and mucous discharges. M. polymorpha grows in the Sandwich Islands, and is said to be the plant from which are made the clubs and other weapons used in warfare by the South Sea Islanders. M. robusta is the rata of New Zealand, where it is employed in ship-building and in other ways. The trees of this genus have thick, opposite, entire leaves, and heads of showy red or white flowers.

Metrotome (mê'trô-tôm), n. [Gr. mêtra, the womb, and tomos, a cutting, from temno, to cut.] In surg. an instrument used to divide the neck of the uterus.

Metroxylon (mê'trô-ô-lyon), n. [Gr. mêtra, the heart of a tree, and xylon, wood.] A genus of plants, now known as Sagus. See SAGO.

Mette, Met, pret of the obs. verb meten (A. Sax. metan), to dream. 'The lover mette he hath his lady wounn.' Chaucer. It is often used impersonally, me mette, signifying I dreamed.

Mettle (mê'tl), n. [Merely an altered spelling of metel, which was formerly used in the same sense, though each has now distinctive applications of its own.] 1. Stuff; material; moral or physical constitution.

Every man living shall assuredly meet with an hour of temptation, a certain critical hour, which shall more especially try what mettle his heart is made of. South.

2. Disposition; character; temper; spirit; constitutional ardour; courage; sprightliness; fire. 'Gentlemen of brave mettle.' Shak. 'A lad of mettle.' Shak.

The winged courser, like a generous horse, Shows most true mettle when you check his course. Pope.

They were all knights of mettle true, Kinsmen to the bold Buccleuch. Sir W. Scott.

— To put a man on or to his mettle, to stimulate a man to do his uttermost; to put a man in a position where he must do his utmost.

according to the later and southern must, mustel. See MICA. Much, great.

O. munda is the powerful grass that grows in plants, herbs, stems, and their two qualities.

Mico (mí-kó), n. [Native name.] A beautiful South American species of monkey, Leontideus argentatus, allied to the marmoset. The hair is of a shining white color, the face and hands of a flesh colour, and the tail black.

Microaster (mí-kro-ás-tér), n. [Gr. micro, small, and aster, a star.] A genus of conularia, plentiful in the chalk formations, so called because the furrows in which the ambulacra are situated have a star-like arrangement.

Microcephalus (mí-kro-séf-al-us), n. [Gr. micro, small, and kephalé, the head.] Having a small or imperfectly formed skull.

Microchronometer (mí-kro-kro-nóm-é-tér), n. [Gr. micro, small, and chronos, time.] An instrument for registering very small periods of time, such as the time that a projectile takes to pass over a short distance, a kind of chronograph. Called also Microchronometer.

Microcosm (mí-kro-kósm), n. [Gr. micro, small, and kosmos, world.] 1. A little world or cosmos, a term that used to be often applied to man, as supposed to be an epitome of the universe or great world (the macrocosm).

If you see this in the map of my microscope, but have it that I am having with enough me? Said Philosophers say that man is a microcosm, or little world, resembling in miniature every part of the great, and the body natural may be compared to the body politic. See M.

2. A little community or society.

And how the time has come when this path is to be branched into a world more vast than that in which he has hitherto wandered, yet for which this microcosm has been an ill preparation. De Witt.

Microcosmic, Microcosmical (mí-kro-kósm-ik, mí-kro-kósm-ik-ál), a. Pertaining to the microcosm or man. — Microcosmic acid, a triple salt of soda, ammonia, and phosphoric acid originally obtained from human urine. It is much employed as a flux in experiments with the blowpipe.

Microcosmography (mí-kro-kósm-og-ráf-í), n. [Gr. micro, small, kosmos, world, and graphein, to write.] The description of man as a little world.

Microscopical (mí-kro-skóp-ik-ál), a. [Gr. micro, small, and skopein, to hear.] Serving to augment weak sounds; or of pertaining to an instrument for augmenting weak sounds.

Microscopist (mí-kro-skóp-ist), n. An instrument to augment small sounds, and assist in hearing.

Microdermatitis (mí-kro-dér-má-tis), n. [Gr. micro, small, and derma, the skin.] A term applied to certain minute cuts, discovered in the scalp by aid of the microscope, in the disease porrigo favus.

Microdon (mí-kro-dón), n. [Gr. micro, small, and odon, a tooth.] A genus of extinct fishes, belonging to the pycnodont or thick toothed family.

Microgeological (mí-kro-jé-ol-ó-jí-ál), a. Pertaining to microgeology, dependent on, or derived from the use of the microscope in relation to geology, as, microgeological investigations.

Micrology (mí-kro-jé-ol-ó-jí-ál), n. [First part of microscopos, and logos.] That department of the science of geology whose facts are ascertained by the use of the microscope.

Micrograph (mí-kro-gráf), n. Same as Microscopograph.

Micrographar (mí-kro-gráf-ár), n. One versed in micrography.

Micrographical (mí-kro-gráf-ik-ál), a. Connected with or relating to micrography.

The Micrographia Dictionary was offered as an aid to our knowledge of the structure and properties of bodies revealed by the microscope. Griffith & Hargrave.

Micrography (mí-kro-gráf-í), n. [Gr. micro, small, and graphein, to describe.] The description of objects too small to be discerned without the aid of a microscope.

Microleptes (mí-kro-léps), n. [Gr. micro, small, and leptes, a robber.] A genus of extinct marvellous, containing the earliest known mammalian inhabitant of our planet. It occurs at the upper part of the upper trias. Only a few teeth have as yet been detected, and from these it appears to have been most nearly related to the little insectivorous Microsaurus, or headed ant-eater of New South Wales.

Microlepis (mí-kro-léps), n. [Gr. micro, small, and lepis, a stone.] Another name for Pycnodont, given to it on account of the small size of its crystals. See PYCNOBOL.

Microlepis (mí-kro-léps), n. [Gr. micro, small, and lepis, a stone.] Of or pertaining to, or consisting of, small stones, opposed to macule. 'Cryst. like chambers of microlepis masonry.' Fraser's Map.

Micrology (mí-kro-ló-jí), n. [Gr. micro, small, and logos, description.] 1. That part of science dependent on microscopic investigations. 2. Micrography. — 3. Undue attention to minute unimportant matters. 'The micrology of the Pharos.' W. Adams.

Micrometer (mí-kro-mé-tér), n. [Gr. micro, small, and metron, a measure.] An instrument used with a telescope or microscope, for measuring very small distances, or the apparent diameters of objects which subtend very small angles. The measurement given directly is that of the image of the object formed at the focus of the object-glass. Microscopes are variously constructed, but in perhaps the most common form (the star microscope) the principle of operation is that the instrument moves a fine thread or wire parallel to itself in the plane of the image of an object, formed in the focus of the telescope, the wire or thread being moved by means of delicate screws with graduated heads, so that the distance traversed by the wire can be measured with the greatest precision. The micrometer is of the utmost value to the astronomer, and in trigonometrical surveys, military and naval operations. Besides the star micrometer, there are various other kinds, as the circumferal or annular micrometer, the double object-glass micrometer, &c. Microscopic screw. See SCREW.

Micrometria, Micrometrical (mí-kro-mé-trí-ál, mí-kro-mé-trí-ál), a. Belonging to the micrometer made by the micrometer; as, micrometric measurements.

Micrometrically (mí-kro-mé-trí-ál-í), adv. By means of a micrometer.

Micrometry (mí-kro-mé-trí), n. The art of measuring small objects or distances with a micrometer.

Microscopeter (mí-kro-skóp-é-tér), n. Same as Microscopometer.

Microscopograph (mí-kro-skóp-og-ráf), n. [Gr. micro, small, and graphein, to write.] An instrument constructed on the general principle of the pantograph for executing extremely minute writing and engraving. By means of this instrument the Lord's prayer has been written on glass within the space of $\frac{1}{1000}$ th of an inch. Called also Micrograph.

Microphone (mí-kro-fón), n. [Gr. micro, small, and phóné, sound.] An instrument to augment small sounds. The instrument invented for this purpose by Mr. Hughes in 1878 is based on the fact that substances possessing little electrical conductivity, when placed in the course of an electric current, have their conductivity much increased by the very smallest amount of pressure. The instrument has various forms, but in most of these one piece of charcoal is held loosely between two other pieces in such a manner as to be affected by the slightest vibrations conveyed to it by the air or by any other medium. The two external pieces are placed in connection with a telephone, and when one places one's ear at the ear piece of the telephone the sounds caused by a fly walking on the wooden support of the microphone appear as loud as the tramp of a horse. By some arrangements the sounds of the human voice conveyed to a distance by the telephone can be made audible in every part of a hall.

Microphonism (mí-kro-fón-íz-m), n. The science of augmenting small sounds.

Microphonous (mí-kro-fón-ús), a. [Gr. micro, small, and phóné, voice.] Serving to augment small or weak sounds; microscopical.

Microphony (mí-kro-fón-í), n. (See above.) Weakness of voice.

Microphotography (mí-kro-fót-og-ráf-í), n. [Gr. micro, small, and phótographia.] A photographic process by which an object is diminished in size, and yet its exact form retained. This process was first utilized for really practical purposes during the siege of Paris in 1870, when communication with the capital was only possible by means of carrier pigeons brought out by balloons and sent back with messages. Letters to Paris were by this means reduced to the minimum of space, and the transcript being taken on paper of extreme fineness, a pigeon could convey a large number of communications. The writing could either be enlarged by photography or read by a microscope.

Microphthalmia, Microphthalmic (mí-kro-fát-mí-ál, mí-kro-fát-mí-ál), n. [Gr. micro, small, and ophthalmos, the eye.] A morbid smallness of the eye.

Microphyllous (mí-kro-fí-lús), a. [Gr. micro, small, and phyllon, a leaf.] Is bot. having small leaves.

Microphyte (mí-kro-fí-té), n. [Gr. micro, small, and phyton, a plant.] A microscopic plant, especially one parasitic in its habits. From the upper leaf-leaf I obtained some species of Drosera, these were quite being quite absent in the lower leaf. J. A. Michay.

Microphylla (mí-kro-fí-lá), n. [Gr. micro, small, and phyllo, a leaf.] The part of a seed that corresponds to the furrow of the ovule; in the seed it is nearly or quite closed.

Microscopical (mí-kro-skóp-ik-ál), a. [Gr. micro, small, and skopein, to see.] Pertaining to a method of determining the nature of bodies in solution when flowing through small or capillary tubes, as, the microscopical method.

Microscope (mí-kro-skóp), n. [Gr. micro, small, and skopein, to view.] An optical instrument consisting of a lens or combination of lenses (in some cases mirrors also) which magnifies objects, and thus renders visible minute objects that cannot be seen by the naked eye, or enlarges the apparent magnitude of small visible bodies, so as to enable us to examine their texture or structure. The single or simplest form of microscope is nothing more than a lens or sphere of any transparent substance, in the focus of which minute objects are placed. When a microscope consists of two or more lenses, one of which forms or enlarges image of objects, while the rest magnify that image, it is called a compound microscope. A binocular microscope is a microscope with two Simple Microscope.

A. A. Eye specimen. B. Rack to adjust glass to width of eye. C. Rack for coarse adjustment of focus. D. Screw for fine adjustment of focus. E. Object-glass. F. Stage. G. G. Rectangular traversing movement. H. Rotatory movement. I. Illuminating mirror.

taken starting from a point above the object-glass, which is single, and gradually diverging to fit the eye of the observer. The rays of light arising from the object under observation are caused to diverge into the two tubes by a prism. A color microscope has a reflector and a condenser connected with it, the former being employed to throw the sun's rays on the latter, by which it is rendered to illuminate the object placed in its focus. A binocular microscope is the same in principle as the other, except that a lamp is used instead of the sun, to illuminate the object. When an oxyhydrogen flame-light is used it is called an amphidromic microscope.

Microscopical (mí-kro-skóp-ik-ál), a. To examine with a microscope. [Rare.]

Microscopically, Microscopically (mí-kro-skóp-ik-ál, mí-kro-skóp-ik-ál), adv. 1. Made by the aid of a microscope, as, microscopical observations. 2. Looking through or using a microscope. [Rare.]

Gradual from those what numerous kinds demand, looking even the microscope eye!

Full entire covers with life. Thomson.

3. Examining a microscope; capable of using small objects.

Why has not man a microscope eye? Page.

4. Very small; visible only by the aid of a microscope; as, a microscopic insect.

Microscopically (mī-kro-skop'ik-al-ē), adv. By the microscope; with minute inspection.

Microscopist (mī-kro-skō-pist or mī-kro-skō-pist), n. One skilled or versed in microscopy.

Microscopium (mī-kro-skō-plūm), n. The microscope, a modern southern constellation, situated above Grus and Indus, at the junction of Capricornus and Sagittarius. It contains ten stars.

Microscopy (mī-kro-skō-pi), n. The use of the microscope; investigation with the microscope; as, to be skilled in microscopy.

Microspectroscope (mī-kro-spek'trō-skop), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and E. spectroscope.] A spectroscope placed in connection with a microscope, in order that the absorption lines may be the more accurately measured. E. H. Knight.

Microspore (mī-kro-spōr), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and spora, a seed.] A spore produced in the capsule of a lycopod.

Microsthenes (mī-krosthēn), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and sthenos, strength.] A member of one of the four groups (Archonta, Megasthenes, Microsthenes, Ootcolides) into which Dana divides mammals. The Microsthenes include those whose life system is small, comprising the bats, insectivora, rodents, &c.

Microsthenic (mī-krosthēn'ik), a. Pertaining to the Microsthenes; of a typically small life system or size.

Microstylar (mī-kro-stil'ēr), a. [Gr. mikros, small, and stylos, a column.] In arch. having a small style or column.—Microstylar architecture, a form of architecture in which there is a separate small order to each floor.

Microtherium (mī-kro-thēr-i-um), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and therion, a wild beast.] A genus of extinct herbivorous mammals found in great abundance in the lacustrine eocene beds of Puy-de-Dôme. Their remains show them to have been closely allied to the Anoplotherium.

Microtome (mī-kro-tōm), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and tomos, a cutting.] An instrument for making very fine sections or slices of objects to prepare them for microscopic examination.

Microzoa, Microzoaria (mī-kro-zō'a, mī-kro-zō-ā'ri-a), n. pl. [Gr. mikros, small, and zōa, animals.] The name given by De Blainville to the minute animals otherwise generally known as infusoria.

Microzyme (mī-kro-zīm), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and zymē, yeast.] One of a class of extremely small living solid particles, existing in the atmosphere, and furnishing the basis on which certain eruptive diseases, as sheep-pox and glanders, and many epidemic diseases, are dependent for their existence. These pestiferous particles seem to have some characters at least in which they resemble ferments, and by multiplying rapidly they excite morbid action in all the structures with which they come in contact. See GERM THEORY.

Micturition (mik-tū-ri'shon), n. [L. micturio, to desire to make water, from mingo, mictum, to make water.] The desire of making water, or passing the urine; a morbid frequency in the passage of urine.

Mid (mid), a. no compar.; superl. midmost. [A. Sax. mid, Goth. midja, Icel. midr (míthr), of cognate origin with L. medius, Gr. mesos, mesos (= medios or methios), Skr. madhyas, middle.] Middle; at equal distance from extremes; intervening. Mid is much used in composition to indicate a position, point of time, and the like, midway between others, or a position in the middle; as, mid-air, mid-channel, mid-day, mid-way, &c.

Mid (mid), n. Middle; midst. 'In the mid he had the habit of a monk.' Fuller. (Rare.)

Mida (mī'da), n. The larva of the bean-fly.

Mid-age (mīd'āj), n. The middle of life, or persons of that age collectively. 'Virgins and boys, mid-age, and wrinkled old.' Shak.

Mid-air (mīd'ār), n. The middle of the air; a lofty position in the air.

No more the mountain larks, while Daphne sings, Shall, lifting in mid-air, suspend their wings. Pope.

Midas (mī'das), n. M. Geoffroy's name for a sub-genus of South American monkeys, of a small size, or Oulastia, including some of the marmosets.

Midas's ear (mī'das-ex-ēr), n. In zool. a species of Auricularia, the A. mida.

Mid-channel (mīd'chan-nel), n. The middle of a channel.

Mid-channel (mīd'chan-nel), adv. In the middle of a channel.

A tree
Was half-drooped from his place and stooped
To drench his dark locks in the gurgling wave.
Mid-channel. Tennyson.

Mid-couples (mīd'ku-plz), n. pl. In Soots law, the writings by which an heir, assignee, or adjudger is connected with a precept of sasine granted in favour of his predecessor or author, which, when such heir, &c., takes infeftment in virtue of such precept, must be deduced in the instrument of sasine.

Mid-course (mīd'kōrs), n. 1. The middle of the course or way. 'The day's mid-course.' Milton.—2. A middle way or mode of procedure; a mode of procedure intermediate between other two; as, there are three courses, and I purpose to adopt the mid-course.

Mid-day (mīd'dā), a. Pertaining to noon; meridional. 'Tired in the mid-day heat.' Shak. 'The mid-day sun.' Addison.

Mid-day (mīd'dā), n. The middle of the day; noon.

At mid-day, O king, I saw in the way a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun.

Midden (mīd'n), n. [A. Sax. midding, same word as Dan. midding, mýdyng, a dung heap, from móg, muck, dung, and dyng, a heap.] A dunghill. [Provincial English and Scotch.]—Midden crow, a name given in some parts of England to the common crow.

Middest (mīd'est), a. superl. of mid. Midmost. Spenser.

Middest (mīd'est), n. Midst; middle. About the middest of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Fuller.

Middle (mīd'l), a.; no compar.; superl. middlemost. [From mid: A. Sax. D. and Dan. midel, G. mittel, middle. See Mid.] 1. Equally distant from the extremes; forming a mean; as, the middle point of a line or circle; the middle station of life.

There are flowers of middle summer, and I think they are given to men of middle age. Shak.

O grant me, Heaven, a middle state, Neither too humble nor too great. Mallet.

2. Intermediate; intervening.

Will, seeking good, finds many middle ends. Sir J. Davies.

—Middle ages, the ages or period of time extending from the decline of the Roman Empire till the revival of letters in Europe, or from the eighth to the middle of the fifteenth century of the Christian era.—Middle distance, in painting, same as Middle Ground.—Middle latitude, in navig. the mean of two latitudes, equal to half the difference of the latitude left, and the latitude arrived at, when they are of the same name, and equal to half their sum when they are of contrary names.—Middle-latitude sailing, that mode of sailing in which the difference of longitude is estimated by means of the differences of latitude, and the intermediate departure, which is supposed to be an arc of a parallel of latitude, at the intermediate or middle latitude.—Middle post, in arch. the same as Kingpost.—Middle quarters of a column, in arch. a name given to the four quarters of a column divided by horizontal sections, forming angles of 45° on the plan.—Middle rail, in carp. the rail of a door level with the hand, on which the lock is usually fixed, whence it is sometimes called the lock rail.—Middle term, in logic, the middle term of a categorical syllogism is that with which the two extremes of the conclusion are separately compared. A new element has been introduced in their midst. Eccl. Rev.

In their midst a form was seen. Montgomery.

These phrases have been objected to by some writers on English, but with no good reason. The same idiom is found in Anglo-Saxon, and similar idioms are common in English. See the following extract.

That in their midst, in our midst, &c., are at odds with the 'genius' of our language, is an assertion somewhat adventurous. As concerns a substantive, its subjective genitive, universally, and its objective genitive, very often, may be expressed prepositively. Love of God, intending 'love emanating from God,' may be exchanged for God's love; but we also say, Plato's commentators, and the world's end. To come to possessive pronouns, we have no scruples about the objective do his pleasure, sing thy praise, in my absence, on your account, to their discredit, in our depths, his equal, &c., &c.; and with these phrases, in our midst is rigidly comparable. With reference to analogical principles in our midst is altogether irreproachable. Fitzedward Hall.

Milk (milk), n. [A. Sax. milc, mooc, meotuc, milk; cog. O. Fris. melok, Goth. miluka, D. Dan. and L.G. melk, Isel. mjólk, Sw. mjólk, G. milch, milk; also Rus. moloko, Pol. and Bohem. mleko, milk. The root is also seen in L. mulgeo, Gr. amelgo, to milk.] 1. A white, often bluish-white, fluid or liquor, secreted by the mammary glands of females of the class Mammalia, including the human species, and drawn from the breasts for the nourishment of their young. It is opaque, has little or no smell, a slightly sweet taste, and a neutral or slightly alkaline reaction. The milk of every animal has certain peculiarities which distinguish it from all other milk, but the general properties are the same in all. It consists chiefly of oleaginous and albuminous materials, with different salts. When milk is allowed to remain at rest it separates into two parts—a thick whitish fluid called cream, which collects in a thin stratum over its surface, and a more dense watery body remaining below. Butter is solidified cream, and is obtained artificially by churning. Milk which has stood for some time after the separation of the cream becomes acid, and then coagulates. When the coagulum is pressed a serous fluid called whey is forced out, and there remains the caseous part of the milk, termed curd. Milk, however, is usually coagulated by the addition of rennet or the decoction of the stomach of a calf. The composition of milk is such that it is capable of supporting animal life without any other food. Milk may be brought to a dry state and powdered, in which state it will keep for a length of time; and by dissolving it in tepid water a kind of semi-artificial milk may be formed. — 2. The white juice of certain plants. — 3. An emulsion of which juice expressed from seeds is one of the constituents; as, the milk of almonds. — Milk of almonds, an emulsion prepared by pounding almonds with sugar and water. — Milk of lime, water mixed with quicklime: so called as resembling milk in appearance and consistence. — Sugar of milk. Same as Lactine (which see). — Condensed milk, milk preserved by having sugar or some other ingredients with or without sugar added to it, and being then reduced by evaporation to a half or a fourth of its bulk, sometimes even to dryness. Milk forms the first element in a considerable number of self-explaining compounds, such as milk-cooler, milk-pail, milk-pen, milk-room, milk-vessel. Milk (milk), v.t. [See the noun.] 1. To draw or press milk from the breasts or udder of by the hand; as, to milk a cow. — 2. To suck.

Mile (mīl), n. [A. Sax. miel, like D. miel, Dan. miil, G. meile, a mile, from L. mille passus, a thousand paces; passus being dropped in common usage, the word became a noun.] A measure of length or distance, and used as an itinerary measure in almost all countries of Europe. The English statute mile contains 8 furlongs, each 40 poles or perches, of 34 yards. The statute mile is therefore 1760 yards, or 5280 feet. It is also 80 surveying chains, of 22 yards each. The square mile is 6400 square chains, or 640 acres. The Roman mile was 1000 paces, each 5 feet; and a Roman foot being equal to 11.93 modern English inches, it follows that the ancient Roman mile was equal to 1614 English yards, or very nearly 3/4ths of an English statute mile. The ancient Scottish mile was 1984 yards = 1.127 English miles; the Irish mile, 2240 yards = 1.273 English miles; the German short mile is 3.987 English miles, the German long mile 5.753. — Geographical or nautical mile, the sixtieth part of a degree of latitude, or 6076 feet nearly.

'A milnary column from which they used to compute the distance of all places of note.' Swediaur.

Milnary (mil'li-a-ri), n. [L. milnarius, a milnester.] A milnester.

Millogram, Millogramme (mil'lo-gram), n. [Fr. millogramme, from L. mille, a thousand, and gramme, a gram.] In the system of French weights and measures, the thousandth part of a gram, equal to a cubic millimetre of water. The milligram is equal to $\frac{1}{1664}$ of an English grain.

Millilitre (mil'lī-tēr or mil-lī-tēr), n. [Fr., from L. mille, a thousand, and Fr. litre.] A French measure of capacity containing the thousandth part of a litre, equal to 0.00103 decimals of a cubic inch.

Millimetre (mil'lī-mē-tēr or mil-lī-mā'tr), n. [Fr. millimètre, from L. mille, a thousand, and metrum, Gr. metron, a measure.] A French lineal measure containing the thousandth part of a metre; equal to 0.03937 of an inch.

Milliner (mil'līn-ēr), n. [Supposed to be for Milaner, from Milan, in Italy, famous for its silks and ribbons: comp. mantua-maker and lombard.] A person, now usually a woman, who makes and sells head-dresses, hats, or bonnets, &c., for females. Nares says 'this is one of the few occupations which females have latterly gained from the other sex. A milliner was originally a man.'

To conceal such real ornaments as these, and shadow their glory as a milliner's wife does her wrought stomacher, with a smoky lawn or a black cyprus. B. Johnson.

Millinery (mil'līn-ēr-ī), n. 1. The business or occupation of a milliner. 'Those who are cunning in the arts of millinery and dressmaking.' Dickens.—2. The articles made or sold by milliners, as head-dresses, hats, or bonnets, laces, ribbons, and the like.

Millinet (mil'līn-et), n. A sort of coarse, stiff, thin muslin.

Milling-tool (mil'līng-tōl), n. A small indented roller used to mill or uurl the edges of the heads of screws, &c.

Million (mil'yōn), n. [Fr. million, from L. mille, a thousand, by the addition of an augmentative suffix.] 1. The number of ten hundred thousand, or a thousand thousand; as, a million of men, or a million men.—2. A very great number, indefinitely. 'A million of manners.' Shak. 'Millions of mischiefs.' Shak.

There are millions of truths that men are not concerned to know. Locke.

3. With the definite article, the great body of the people; the multitude; the public; the masses. 'Oh, law-making masters, and taskers of the common million.' D. Jerrold.

For the play, I remember, pleased not the million; 'twas caviare to the general. Shak.

Millionaire, Millionnaire (mil'yōn-ār), n. [Fr. millionnaire.] A man worth a million of money; a man of great wealth.

The dark old place will be gilt with the touch of a millionaire. Tennyson.

Millionary (mil'yōn-a-ri), a. Pertaining to millions; consisting of millions; as, the millionary chronology of the Pundita. Pinkerton.

Millioned (mil'yōnd), a. Multiplied by millions. [Rare.]

Time, whose million'd accidents Creep in 'twixt vows and change decrees of kings. Shak.

Millionist (mil'yōn-ist), n. A millionaire. Consistently with his principles, Southey wrote millionist, instead of millionaire, our misspelling of the French millionnaire. Fitzedward Hall.

Millionnaire (mil'yōn-ār), n. See MILLIONAIRE.

Millionth (mil'yōnth), a. Ten hundred thousandth; constituting one of a million.

Millionth (mil'yōnth), n. One of a million parts; the quotient of unity divided by a million; a ten hundred thousandth part.

Mill-mountain (mil'mōun-tān), n. Same as Mountain-lax.

Mill-pick (mil'pik), n. A tool for dressing millstones, or for giving them their corrugated or otherwise roughened surface.

Mill-pond (mil'pōnd), n. A pond or reservoir of water raised for driving a mill-wheel.

Mill-pool (mil'pōl), n. A mill-pond.

Mill-race (mil'rās), n. The current of water that drives a mill-wheel, or the canal in which it is conveyed.

Millree, Millree (mil'rē), n. Same as Milree, from which this is corrupted.

Mill-rind, Mill-rynd (mil'rind), n. A moline (which see). Gloss of Heraldry.

Mill-sixpence, Gilded Sixpence (mil'siks-pens, mil'd siks-pens), n. An old English coin first minted in 1561. 'Seven groats in mill-sixpences.' Shak.

Mill-spindle (mil'spin-dl), n. The vertical shaft or spindle of a grinding-mill by which the runner or revolving millstone is supported.

Millstone (mil'stōn), n. A stone used for grinding grain. The stone best suited for this purpose is called buhrstone or burr-stone or burrh (which see).—Millstone balance, a weight so placed as to balance any inequalities of weight in a millstone.—Millstone bridge, the bar across the eye of a millstone by which it is supported at the end of the spindle.—Millstone chass, the arrangement of the furrows on the face of a millstone.—Millstone-dresser, a machine for cutting the furrows on the face of a millstone.—Millstone hammer and millstone pick. Same as Mill-pick.—Millstone grit, the name given to a siliceous conglomerate rock. It has been thus named from some of the strata being worked for millstones. It constitutes one of the members of the carboniferous group underlying the true coal-measures, and overlying the mountain limestone. In Wales known as 'farewell rock,' because when the miners strike it they bid farewell to profitable seams. Millstones are also got from the old red and Permian strata.—To see into or through a millstone, to see with acuteness, or to penetrate into abstruse subjects.—To weep or drop millstones, not to weep at all; to be insensible to grief.

Your eyes drop millstones, when fools' eyes drop tears. Shak.

Mill-tail (mil'tāl), n. The current of water leaving a mill-wheel after turning it.

Mill-tooth (mil'tōth), n. A grinder or molar tooth.

Mill-ward (mil'wārd), n. The keeper of a mill.

Mill-wheel (mil'whēl), n. A wheel used to drive a mill; a water-wheel.

Mill-work (mil'wērk), n. 1. The machinery of mills.—2. The operation or art of constructing mills.

Mill-wright (mil'rit), n. A mechanic or wright whose occupation it is to construct the machinery of mills.

Millord (mil-lōrd'), n. A form used for my lord by foreigners.

Milreis (mil'rēs), n. [Pg. mil, a thousand, and reis, pl. of real, a small denomination of money.] A Portuguese coin worth a thousand reis or about 4s. 4d.

Milsey (mil'sē), n. [Contr. of milk-sieve.] A sieve for straining milk. [Local.]

Milt (milt), n. [A. Sax. and I.G. mille, Dan. milt, Icel. milt, G. milt, the spleen; D. milt, the spleen, also the milt of fishes; root meaning doubtful. The application of the term to the milt or soft roe of fishes seems to have arisen from the resemblance of the word to the word milk, and from the milky appearance of the milt of fishes; in German, Danish, and Swedish the word for milk also means milt or fish roe; so Fr. lait, milk, from L. lac, milk.] 1. In anat. the spleen, an organ situated in the left hypochondrium under the diaphragm.—2. The soft roe of fishes, or the spermatic organ of the males.

Milt (milt), v.t. To impregnate the roe or spawn of the female fish.

Milter (milt'ēr), n. [D. miltter, a male fish; comp. Dan. meltfisk, G. miltcher, lit. milk-fish. See MILT.] A male fish or one having a milt.

Miltonic (mil-ton'ik), a. Relating to Milton or his poetry.

If time the avenger exorcises his wrongs, And makes the word 'Miltonic' mean 'sublime.' Byron.

Miltwaste (milt'wāst), n. [From being believed formerly to be a remedy for wasting or disease of the spleen or milt; comp. splenwort.] A fern, Ceterach officinarum. See CETERACH.

Milvinae (mil-vīnē), n. pl. A sub-family of raptorial birds, family Falconidae, of which Milvus is the type genus.

Milvine (mil'vin), a. Belonging to or resembling birds of the kite family.

Milvus (mil'vus), n. [L., a kite.] A genus of raptorial birds of the family Falconidae; the kites. See KITE.

Mim (mim), a. [Probably a form of mum, silent.] Primly silent; prim; demure; precise; affectedly modest; quiet; mute; also used adverbially. 'Meek an'mim.' Burns. [Provincial.]

Mimbar (mim'bār), n. [Ar.] A pulpit in a mosque. See MIMBAR.

Mimes (mim), n. [L. mimicus; Gr. mimos.] 1. A species of dramatic entertainment among the Greeks and Romans. Among the former the mime was a dramatic performance of irregular form, in which ridiculous occurrences of real life were clothed in a poetical dress, and resembled the modern farce or vaudeville in its character and accompaniment. Among the Romans, mimes were a species of comedy in which gestures and mimicry predominated. They were of a coarse and often indecent character.—2. An actor in such performances.

Mime† (mim), v.t. To mimic, or play the buffoon.

Mimer† (mim'ēr), n. A mimic.

Mimesis (mi-mēs'is), n. [Gr.] In rhet. Imitation of the voice or gestures of another.

Mimetene (mi-mē-tēn), n. [From Gr. mimētēs, an imitator, from its close resemblance to pyromorphite.] The mineral arsenate of lead occurring in yellowish or brownish hexagonal crystals. Also called Mimetite and Mimetesite.

Mimetic (mi-met'ik), a. [Gr. mimētikos. See MIMIC.] 1. Apt to imitate; given to aping or mimicry.—2. In nat. hist. characterized by mimicry: applied to plants or animals which wonderfully resemble each other in external appearance, or to animals which closely resemble the natural objects by which they are surrounded, as the insects of the family Phasmidae. See MIMICRY, PHASMIDÆ.

In all these cases it appears that the mimetic species is protected from some enemy by its outward similarity to the form which it mimics. H. A. Nicholson.

Mimetism (mi-met-izm), n. The act, process, or habit, of mimicking or imitating; mimicry, as among certain insects. See MIMICRY, 2.

Mimic, Mimical (mim'ik, mim'ik-al), a. [L. mimicus; Gr. mimikos, from mimos, an imitator, actor, mime.] 1. Imitative; inclined to imitate or to ape; having the practice or habit of imitating.

Man is of all creatures the most mimical in gesture, speech, &c. Watson.

Oh in her absence mimic Fancie waxes. To imitate her (Reason); but, misjoining, shapes Wild work produces oft, and most in dreams. Milton.

2. Consisting of imitation; made in imitation; imitating; as, mimic gestures.

Blew mimic howlings to the silent owls That they might answer him. Wordsworth.

Mimic (mim'ik), n. 1. One who imitates or mimics; especially a buffoon who attempts to excite laughter or derision by acting or speaking in the manner of another. 'Jugglers and dancers, antic, mummers, mimics.' Milton.

When full grown it (vanity) is the worst of vices; and the occasional mimic of them all. Burke.

2. An actor.

Anon this Thibbe must be answered, And forth my mimic comes. Shak.

3. In nat. hist. a plant or animal that mimics. See MIMICRY, v.t. 2.

Mimic (mim'ik), v.t. pret. & pp. mimicked; ppp. mimicked. 1. To imitate or ape, especially for sport; to ridicule by imitation; to act or speak like intentionally.

The walk, the words, the gesture, could supply, The habit mimic, and the mien belie. Dryden.

Both Swift and Voltaire have been successfully mimicked, but no man has yet been able to mimic Addison. Macaulay.

2. In nat. hist. to assume, as some animals and plants do, a close resemblance to another organism generally of an entirely different nature, or even to some inorganic object.

There are numerous cases in which animals mimic certain natural objects, and thus greatly diminish their chances of being detected by their natural foes. H. A. Nicholson.

SYN. To ape, imitate, counterfeit, mock.

Mimically (mim'ik-al-ly), adv. In a mimic or imitative manner. 'Mimically to imitate their neighbours' fooleries.' South.

Mimicalness (mim'ik-al-ness), n. The quality of being mimical.

To speak plainly, it is not the fierceness of the lion, nor the fraud of the fox, but the mimicalness of the ape, which, in our eye, hath discredited the undoubted truth. Fisher.

Mimic-beetle (mim'ik-bē-tl), n. One of certain coleopterous insects of the family Histeridae, so named from their feigning death when disturbed.

Mimicker (mim'ik-ēr), n. One who mimics. Mimicry (mim'ik-ri), n. 1. Imitation, often ludicrous imitation for sport or ridicule. 'The mimicry of man.' Gay. 'Absolute princes, who ruin their people by a mimicry of the great monarchs.' Hume.—2. In nat. hist. the name given to that condition or phenomenon which consists in certain plants and animals exhibiting a wonderful resemblance to certain other plants or animals, or to the natural objects in the midst of which they live. This peculiar characteristic is generally the chief means of protection the

1. To remember; to have a recollection. [Old English and Scotch.]

Minded (mind'ed), a. 1. Disposed; inclined; in this sense not used attributively. 'If men were minded to live virtuously.' Tillotson.

Joseph . . . was minded to put her away privily. Mat. l. 19.

2. Having a mind; only in composition; as, high-minded, low-minded, feeble-minded, sober-minded, double-minded.

Mindedness (mind'ed-ness), n. Disposition; inclination toward anything, only in composition, as, heavenly-mindedness. 'Historical-mindedness.' Pail Mall Gazette.

Minder (mind'er), n. [Not one who minds, but one who is minded or taken care of.] An orphan entrusted by a poor-law board to the care of a private person. Dickens.

Mindful (mind'ful), a. Attentive, regarding with care; bearing in mind; heedful; observant.

What is man, that thou art mindful of him? Ps. vi. 5.

1 promises to be mindful of your afflictions. Hammond.

Mindfully (mind'ful-ly), adv. Attentively; heedfully.

Mindfulness (mind'ful-ness), n. Attention; regard; heedfulness.

Minding-school (mind'ing-shul), n. A house in which minders are kept. Dickens. See MINDER.

Mindless (mind'less), a. 1. Not endowed with mind. 'Mindless bodies.' Sir J. Davies. 2. Stupid, unthinking, unaccompanied by the exercise of mind. 'Pronounce them a gross lot, a mindless slave.' Shak.

I must severely guard my pupils from the thought that sacred rest may be honourably exchanged for selfish and mindless activity. Ruskin.

2. Inattentive; heedless; forgetful; negligent; careless. 'Curst Athena, mindless of thy work.' Shak.

Mind-stricken (mind'strik'n), a. Moved; affected in mind. 'Mind-stricken by the beauty of virtue.' Sir P. Sidney.

Mine (min), s. called sometimes a personal adjective [A Sax. min, from me, with n, a genitive or adjective suffix; cogn. O. Sax. O. Fris. O. H. G. min, Dan. and Sw. min, local min, Goth. meins, D. mejn, G. mein (both pron. like mine). My is a shortened form, the n beginning to be dropped before consonants in the twelfth century. Comp. thine.] My; belonging to me. It was once regularly used before nouns beginning with vowels, my being used before consonants. 'I kept myself from mine iniquity.' Ps. xlviii. 24. But this use is now archaic or poetical, my alone being used adjectively with nouns, and made to stand before a vowel as well as before a consonant, as, my iniquity. Mine is now generally used, similarly to thine, hers, yours, theirs, as equivalent to my followed by a noun, and it may serve either for a nominative or an objective; as, his book is good, and so is mine (that is, my book); look at mine; give him mine; this house of mine. The last expression is a little peculiar. It means simply 'this my house,' though it should rather mean this one of my houses. So also, this of his, this of yours, &c.

Mine (min), n. [Fr. mine, a mine, according to Brachet from miner, to form a mine, from L. minerr, to drive, to conduct, originally to drive (animals) with threats, from minere, a thrust.] 1. A subterranean cavity or passage, especially, (a) a pit or excavation in the earth, from which coal, metallic ores, and other mineral substances are taken by digging. The pits from which stones only are taken are called quarries. Mines are generally denominated from the substances obtained from them, as, for instance, gold, silver, iron, lead, coal, alum, salt, mines, &c. I would not wed her for a mine of gold. Shak.

(b) Mine a subterranean gallery or passage dug under the wall or rampart of a fortification, where a quantity of powder or other explosive may be lodged for blowing up the works. Common mine (min't), one in which the radius of the crater, that is, the radius of the circular opening produced by the explosion, is equal to the line of least resistance, that is, the shortest line from the centre of the charge to the surface of the ground. — Overcharged or surcharged mine, one that produces a crater the radius of which is greater than the line of least resistance. — Undercharged mine, one that produces a crater the radius of which is less than the line of least resistance. — 2. A rich source or store of wealth or anything highly valued; as, Sycamore's poems are a mine of poetical imagery.

O, Antony, thou mine of beauty! Shak.

Mine (min), s. 1. pret. & pp. mined; ppr. mining. 1. To dig a mine or pit in the earth, especially for the purpose of obtaining minerals, or of depositing powder or some other explosive to blow up anything.

The enemy mined, and they countermined. Robt. Blyth.

2. To form a subterranean tunnel, gallery, or hole by scratching; to form a burrow or lodge in the earth; to burrow; as, the sand-martin has to mine in order to make a nest. 3. To practise secret or insidious means of injury.

Mine (min), s. 1. To dig away or otherwise remove the substratum or foundation from; to undermine; to sap; hence, to ruin or destroy by slow degrees or secret means. 'While rank corruption, mining all within, infects unseen.' Shak. 'They mined the walls.' Hayward.

Too late to cut down these hemlock trees, the spoilers had mined them, and placed a quantity of gunpowder in the cavity. Sir W. Scott.

Mine-captain (min'kap-tan or min'kap-tin), n. The overseer of a mine.

Mine-chamber (min'cham-ber), n. MINE, the place where the charge is deposited in a mine.

Mine-dial (min'di-al), n. A kind of magnetic compass consisting of a box and needle, used by miners.

Minecat (min'e-on), n. A minion; a wanton.

Miner (min'er), n. One who mines; especially, (a) one who digs for metals and other minerals.

No good miner casts away his muck because he finds a vein of tough clay or a shell of stone. Sp. Hall.

(b) One who digs canals or passages under the walls of a fort, &c. Chrenbretstein, with her shattered wall, black with the miner's blast. Byron.

Mineral (min'er-al), n. [Fr. minéral, from miner, to mine. See MINE.] Any ingredient in the earth's crust, more specifically, a body destitute of organisation, but with a definite chemical composition, and which naturally exists within the earth or at its surface. See extract and MINERALOGY.

2. A mine. His very madness, the same one Among a mineral of human brain, Shows itself pure. Shak.

Mineral (min'er-al), a. 1. Pertaining to minerals; consisting of minerals; as, the mineral kingdom.

There is little resemblance between a piece of a mineral substance found in the earth, and a plough, an axe, or a saw. Y. S. M.W.

2. Impregnated with minerals or mineral matter, as, mineral waters, a mineral spring. — Mineral acids, a name given to sulphuric, nitric, and hydrochloric acids. — Mineral adipocere. See under ADIPOCERE. — Mineral black, a native oxide of carbon, one variety of which is known as black ochre. — Mineral scapolite, a variety of bitumen, intermediate between the harder and softer kinds. It sometimes much resembles india-rubber in its softness and elasticity, and hence its name. It occurs near Castleton in Derbyshire. Also called Elastirite. — Mineral shemelon, a manganese of potash, so called from the variety of colours which its aqueous solution successively exhibits. See under CHAMELION. — Mineral charcoal, a fibrous variety of non-bituminous mineral coal. — Mineral cotton, a fibre formed by allowing a jet of steam to escape through a stream of liquid slag, by which the slag is blown into fine white threads, sometimes 3 or 4 feet in length. It is a poor conductor of heat, and is therefore suggested as a covering for steam-bollers and pipes. E. H. Knight. — Mineral green, carbonate of copper. — Mineral kingdom, that grand division of natural objects which includes minerals or inorganic bodies, and of which mineralogy is the science. — Mineral oil. See PETROLEUM. — Mineral pitch, a solid softish bitumen. — Mineral salt, a salt of a mineral acid. — Mineral solution, arseuical liquor, or liquor potasse arsenitis. — Mineral tar, bitumen of a tarry consistence. — Mineral waters, a term applied to certain spring waters, containing so large a portion of foreign matters as to be unfit for ordinary use. The ingredients contained in the principal mineral springs of this country are, gases, carbonates, sulphates, muriates, oxides of iron, and silica. Mineral waters may, in most cases, be prepared artificially. — Mineral weed. Same as Oxocoria (which see). — Mineral wood, a plant found wild in the state of Minnesota, America, so called because it is supposed to grow on spots where there is lead underneath. — Mineral yellow, or patent yellow, a compound of oxide and chloride of lead, obtained by digesting powdered litharge in a solution of common salt, washing, drying, and fusing the product. It is used as a pigment.

Mineralist (min'er-al-ist), n. One skilled in or concerned about minerals. Boyle, Woodward.

Mineralisation (min'er-al-iz-ation), n. The act or process of mineralising; the process of converting or being converted into a mineral, as vegetable matter into coal, animal fibre into adipocere, or a metal into an oxide, sulphuret, or other ore. Pag.

Mineralise (min'er-al-iz), s. pret. & pp. mineralised, ppr. mineralising. To convert into a mineral; to give mineral properties or characteristics to; to reduce to a mineral form, to impregnate with mineral substance; as, to mineralise vegetable matter into coal.

In these caverns the bones are not mineralised. Woodward.

to it. Mineralogy (min'er-a-l'og-ee), n. [Fr. minéral, and Gr. logos, discourse.] The science which treats of the properties of mineral substances, and teaches us to characterize, distinguish, and classify them according to their properties. It comprehends the study or science of all inorganic substances in the earth or on its surface. As distinguished from geology, mineralogy deals with the various mineral bodies as separate constituents of the earth's crust, and examines their properties as such, while geology treats them in the aggregate, as building up the crust of the earth, and as forming masses and presenting phenomena that have a history to be investigated. Minerals may be described and classified either in accordance with their chemical composition, their crystallographic forms, or their physical properties of hardness, fracture, colour, lustre, &c., or a combination of all, and thus various systems of classification have been adopted.

Mineral-surveyor (min'er-al-sar-vay'er), n. A surveyor of mines; one who understands the probable value of lodes and their facilities for working.

Minerva (mi-nér'va), n. [L., from root of mens, mind, Min. men, men, to think.] In Rom. myth. one of the three chief divinities to whom a common temple was dedicated on the Capitoline hill, Jupiter and Juno being the other two. She was regarded as a virgin, and as the daughter of Jupiter the supreme god, and was hence in later times identified by the Romans with the Greek goddess Athena, or Pallas Athena, the goddess of wisdom, of war, and of the liberal arts, and was represented, like her, as a virgin, with a grave and noble countenance, armed with helmet, shield, and spear, animal has against its enemies. It is well seen in the leaf-insects (Phyllium) and in the 'walking-stick' insects (Phasmidae). Certain tropical butterflies reproduce the appearance of leaves so closely that even the parasitic fungi which grow upon the leaves are misled. So also a South American moth has a most accurate resemblance to a humming-bird; while the cacti of America and the euphorbias of Africa might easily be mistaken for each other, though widely different in structural characters. Called also Mimastis and Proteotia Reasemblance.

Mimastis (mi-mā'shōn), n. The frequent use of the letter m.

The principal differences between these dialects (the Semitic-Babylonian and the Semitic-Assyrian) are—mi, the use of mimastis by the Babylonians, and not by the Assyrians; thus the Babylonian words Sumirum and Abbadim, were rendered by the Assyrians Sumiri and Abbadu. Eng. Ency.

Mim-moned (mim'mōd), s. [Scotch.] 1. Reserved in discourse, implying the idea of affectation of modesty.

I'm no for being mim-moned, when there's no reason, but a man had as good, whilst, cast a knot on his tongue. Gold.

2. Affectedly moderate at table.

Mimograph (mim-og'ra-fēr), n. [Gr. mimos, a mime, and graphō, to write.] A writer of mimes or farces.

Mimosa (mi-mō'sa), n. A genus of plants. See MIMOSAE and SENSITIVE-PLANT.

Mimoseae (mi-mō'sā-ē), n. pl. [L. from mimos, an actor or imitator.] A division of Leguminosae consisting of shrubs or trees, rarely herbs, having regular usually pentamerous flowers in heads or spikes, usually with small petals and sepals and conspicuous stamens, and bipinnate leaves, the principal genus of which is Acacia. Many of the species are remarkable for the irritability of their leaves, and hence they have been termed sensitive-plants.

Mimosa (mi-mō'sā), n. A fossil seed-pod supposed to have belonged to a plant of the Mimosa family.

ing balconies, common in mosques in Mohammedan countries. Minarets are used by the priests for summoning from the balconies the people to prayers at stated times of the day; so that they answer the purpose of bells in Christian churches.

Minarets, Mosque of St. Sophia, Constantinople.

Minargent (min-ār'ent), n. [An irregular compound, the elements of which are taken from aluminum, and L. argentum, silver.] A kind of aluminum bronze, the ingredients of which are copper 1000 parts, nickel 700, tungsten 50, and aluminum 10. R. H. Knight.

Minatorily (min-ā-to-ri-ly), adv. In a minatory manner; with threats.

Minatory (min-ā-to-ri), a. Threatening; menacing. 'A statute minatory and minatory.' Bacon.

Minati (mi-nā'ti), n. A kind of pheasant met with in India. Written also Menali, Menat.

They had only killed a few splendid minati. W. H. Russell.

Mince (mins), v. t. pref. and pp. minced, ppe. mincing. [O Fr. mincer, to mince, to cut into small pieces, from mince, fine, thin, small; the history of the word is uncertain, though the root must be the same as that of minor (which see). The development of meanings in English seems to have arisen through confounding this word with minish.] 1. To cut or chop into very small pieces; as, to mince meat. 'Mincing her husband's limbs.' Shak.—2. To diminish in speaking; to retrench, cut, or omit a part of, for the purpose of suppressing the truth; to extenuate; to palliate; now most common in the phrase to mince the matter, to mince matters.

Silen, now mince the sin,
And mollify damnation with a phrase. Dryden.
If, to mince his meaning, I had either omitted some part of what he said, or taken from the strength of his expression, I certainly had wronged him. Dryden.

2. To pronounce with affected elegance; not to utter the full sound of; hence, to make an affected display of.

Behold you smpering dame
That minces virtue, and doth shake the head
To hear of pleasure's name. Shak.

—Mincéd collops, minced beef; minced meat. [Scotch.]

Mince (mins), v. t. 1. To walk with short steps; to walk with affected nicety; to affect delicacy in manner.

Away, I say; time wears: hold up your head and mince.
Because the daughters of Zion are haughty . . . walking and mincing as they go. Is. li. 16.

2. To speak with affected elegance. 'Whose mincing dialect.' Lloyd. 'The mincing lady-proress and the broad-speaking wife of Bath.' Dryden.

Mince-meat, Minced-meat (mins'mēt, mins'mēt), n. Meat chopped small.

Mince-ple, Minced-ple (mins'pl, mins'tpl), n. A pie made with minced meat and other ingredients, baked in paste. 'Brawn and minced-pies upon New-Year's day.' Spectator.

Mincer (mins'ēr), n. One who minces: (a) one who cuts into small pieces. (b) One who speaks softly or with affected nicety; one who walks with affected elegance. (c) One who suppresses part of the truth; one who detracts. 'Miners of each other's fame.' Tennyson.

Mincing (mins'ing), p. and s. 1. Speaking or walking affectedly. 'Fit mate for such a mincing minion.' Spenser.—2. Affectedly elegant.

I'll turn two mincing steps
Into a manly stride. Shak.

Mincingly (mins'ing-ly), adv. 1. In small parts; not fully; so as to curtail. Hooker. 2. With a mincing manner; affectedly. Sheldon.

Minutariency (mingk-tū'ri-en-si), n. Minutition.

Mind (mind), n. [A Sax. mynd, gemynd, mind, thought, intention, also myne, memory, intention; cog. Dan. minde, memory, remembrance; Ice. minni, memory, a memorial; from a root man, to think, seen also in mean, to intend; L. mens, mentis, mind, mentis, to remember; Gr. meno, mind. See MAN, MEAN.] 1. The intellectual or intelligent power in man; the power that conceives, judges, reasons, wills, imagines, remembers, or performs any other intellectual operation; the understanding; the soul.

I fear I am not in my perfect mind. Shak.

2. The mind in any of its states, relations, or functions; (a) disposition; cast of thought and feeling.

I am a fellow of the strangest mind. Shak.

(b) Reflection; contemplation; consideration; thoughts; opinion.

Have mind upon your health, tempt me no further. Shak.

I'll show you my mind. Shak.

(c) Inclination; desire; intention; purpose; will. 'Few, but all brave, all of one mind with him.' Tennyson. (d) Memory; remembrance; in the phrases to call to mind; to have, to keep, to bear in mind, to put a person in mind of a thing. [The phrase 'to put a thing into one's mind' now means to suggest a thing to one; but Shakespeare has it in the sense of to recall to mind, for which we now use the last of the phrases given above.]

All this from my remembrance bristled with Sinfully pluck'd, and not a man of you
Had so much grace to put it in my mind. Shak.]

(e) Courage; spirit. Chapman.

[These shades of meaning are not to be regarded as, properly speaking, different senses of the word mind. In each case this word is used only in its strict sense of the intelligent principle in man, and the modified sense is due to the nature of the phrase in which it occurs. Hence, though in some phrases one modification of meaning is clearly prominent, in others it is scarcely possible to say what is the precise shade of meaning intended, whether, for example, purpose or opinion.]—To be in two minds about a thing, to be in doubt.

At first I was in two minds about taking such a liberty. Dickens.

—To have half a mind to, to be pretty much disposed to; to have a certain inclination to.

I have half a mind to settle the question from this point. Dickens.

Mind-stricken (mind'strik-en), a. Moved; affected in mind. 'Mind-stricken by the beauty of virtue.' Sir P. Sidney.

Mine (mín), a. called sometimes a prometall-adjective. [A Sax. mín, from mæ, with n, a genitive or adjective suffix; cog. O. Sax. O. Fria O. H. G. mín, Dan. and Sw. mín, loal, min, Goth. meins, D. mejn, G. mein (both pron. like mine).] Mín is a shortened form, the n beginning to be dropped before consonants in the twelfth century. Comp. thine.) Mín; belonging to me. It was once regularly used before nouns beginning with vowels, my being used before consonants. 'I kept myself from mine iniquity.' Ps. xviii. 23. But this use is now archaic or poetical, my alone being used adjectively with nouns, and made to stand before a vowel as well as before a consonant, as, my iniquity. Mine is now generally used, similarly to thine, hers, ours, yours, theirs, as equivalent to my followed by a noun, and it may serve either for a nominative or an objective; as, his book is good, and so is mine (that is, my book); look at mine; give him mine; this house of mine. The last expression is a little peculiar. It means simply 'this my house,' though it should rather mean this one of my houses. So also, this of his, this of yours, &c.

Mine (mín), n. [Fr. mine, a mine, according to Brachet from miner, to form a mine, from L. minare, to drive, to conduct, originally to drive (animals) with threats, from minare, a threat.] 1. A subterranean cavity or passage; especially, (a) a pit or excavation in the earth, from which coal, metallic ores, and other mineral substances are taken by digging. The pits from which stones only are taken are called quarries. Mines are generally denominated from the substances obtained from them; as, for instance, gold, silver, iron, lead, coal, alum, salt, mines, &c.

I would not wed her for a mine of gold. Shak.

(b) Mín, a subterranean gallery or passage dug under the wall or rampart of a fortification, where a quantity of powder or other explosive may be lodged for blowing up the works. — Common mine (mín), one in which the radius of the crater, that is, the radius of the circular opening produced by the explosion, is equal to the line of least resistance, that is, the shortest line from the centre of the charge to the surface of the ground. — Overcharged or undercharged mine, one that produces a crater the radius of which is greater than the line of least resistance. — Undercharged mine, one that produces a crater the radius of which is less than the line of least resistance. — 2. A rich source or store of wealth or anything highly valued; as, Spenser's poems are a mine of poetical imagery.

O, Antony, thou mine of beauty! Shak.

Mine (mín), v. i. pret. & pp. mined; ppr. mining. 1. To dig a mine or pit in the earth, especially for the purpose of obtaining minerals, or of depositing powder or some other explosive to blow up anything.

The enemy mined, and they countermined. Raleigh.

2. To form a subterranean tunnel, gallery, or hole by scratching; to form a burrow or lodge in the earth; to burrow; as, the sand-martin has to mine in order to make a nest. 3. To practise secret or insidious means of injury.

Mine (mín), v. t. To dig away or otherwise remove the substratum or foundation from; to undermine; to sap; hence, to ruin or destroy by slow degrees or secret means. 'While rank corruption, mining all within, infects unseen.' Shak. 'They mined the walls.' Hayward.

Too hazy to cut down these immense trees, the spoilers had mined them, and placed a quantity of gunpowder in the cavity. Sir W. Scott.

Mine-captain (mín'kap-tán or mín'kap-tín), n. The overseer of a mine.

Mine-chamber (mín'chám-bér), n. Mín, the place where the charge is deposited in a mine.

See under ADIPOCERE. — Mineral black, a native oxide of carbon, one variety of which is known as black oak. — Mineral ecoutehouse, a variety of bitumen, intermediate between the harder and softer kinds. It sometimes much resembles india-rubber in its softness and elasticity, and hence its name. It occurs near Castleton in Derbyshire. Also called Elcterite. — Mineral chameleon, a manganese of potash, so called from the variety of colours which its aqueous solution successively exhibits. See under CHAMELEON. — Mineral charcoal, a fibrous variety of non-bituminous mineral coal. — Mineral cotton, a fibre formed by allowing a jet of steam to escape through a stream of liquid slag, by which the slag is blown into fine white threads, sometimes 2 or 3 feet in length. It is a poor conductor of heat, and is therefore suggested as a covering for steam-boilers and pipes. E. H. Knight. — Mineral green, carbonate of copper. — Mineral kingdom, that grand division of natural objects which includes minerals or inorganic bodies, and of which mineralogy is the science. — Mineral oil. See PETROLEUM. — Mineral pitch, a solid softish bitumen. — Mineral salt, a salt of a mineral acid. — Mineral solution, arsenical liquor, or liquor potassæ arsenialis. — Mineral tar, bitumen of a tarry consistence. — Mineral waters, a term applied to certain spring waters, containing so large a portion of foreign matters as to be unfit for ordinary use. The ingredients contained in the principal mineral springs of this country are, gases, carbonates, sulphates, nitrates, oxide of iron, and silica. Mineral waters may, in most cases, be prepared artificially. — Mineral weas. Same as Oxocoris (which see). — Mineral weed, a plant found wild in the state of Minnesota, America, so called because it is supposed to grow on spots where there is lead underneath. — Mineral yellow, or patent yellow, a compound of oxide and chloride of lead, obtained by digesting powdered litharge in a solution of common salt, washing, drying, and fusing the product. It is used as a pigment.

Of marbles green, and braided hair,
And kirtles furred with miniver. Sir W. Scott.

Mink (mingk), n. An American and European quadruped, allied to the polecat and weasel (Putorius Vison or Lutreola). It is semi-aquatic, burrowing on the banks of rivers and ponds, living on frogs, crayfishes, and fishes, which it pursues in the water. It exhales a strong odour of musk, and its fur is in considerable request. The European and American minks are by some regarded as distinct species. It is also called Minz and Minz-otter.

Minnesinger (min-ne-sing-er), n. [O. G. minne, friendship, love, and singer, a singer.] One of a class of early German lyric poets and singers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, so called from love being the chief theme of their poems. The body was composed chiefly or exclusively of men of noble descent, comprising knights, nobles, princes, and even emperors. They sung their pieces to their own accompaniment on the viol, and often engaged in poetical contests for the gratification of princes and ladies of the court. Their songs are mostly in the Swabian dialect, which during the brilliant days of the house of Swabia was the court language of Germany. The most extensive collection of their songs was compiled by Rüdiger von Manasse, burgomaster of Zürich in the beginning of the fourteenth century, and consists of from 1400 to 1500 pieces. The minnesingers gave way to the mastersingers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. See MASTER-SINGER.

Minnie (min-i), n. An infantine word for mother. [Scotch.]

E. minin*, meninam, Sc. minnan, from L. minutus, smallest; in any case from a widely spread root meaning small. See MINOR.] A species of cyprinoid fish, the Leuciscus phoxinus (Cuv.), and the smallest British species of that family. It inhabits fresh-water streams. In America the name is given to the Phoxinus lavie.

Hear you this Triton of the minnows? Shak.

Minor (mī'nor), a. [L. minor, smaller; without a positive, and serving as the comparative of parvus, small. From a root min, small, found in several of the Aryan tongues; comp. A. Sax. minian, to lessen; Dan. Sw. mindre, Icel. minni, G. minder, less; Ir. and Gael. min, small, fine; Gr. minythō, to lessen.] 1. Less; smaller: used relatively, and opposed to major; as, the minor portion of the inhabitants; the minor (as opposed to the major) axis of an ellipse; he also was guilty, but in a minor degree.

They altered this custom from cases of high concernment to the most trivial debates, the minor part ordinarily entering their protest. Clarendon.

2. Absolutely small; petty; unimportant; inconsiderable; not principal; as, minor faults; minor considerations; minor points in an argument. 'Petty errors and minor lapses.' Sir T. Browne.

'The suppression or subtle hinting of minor details.' Dr. Caird.—3. In music, less by a lesser semitone: a term used to distinguish the mode or key having a minor third above the tonic or key-note. It is also applied to all the diatonic intervals. The minor third comprises a tone and a semitone A, C; while the major third is composed of two whole tones C, E.—Minor key, in music, that key or arrangement of tones and semitones which is distinguished from the major key by having a minor third instead of a major third from the tonic or key-note. It is adapted to solemn and mournful subjects.—Minor term, in logic, the subject of the conclusion of a categorical syllogism.—Minor premises, that which contains the minor term.

Minor (mī'nor), n. 1. A person of either sex under age; one under a certain age, and thereby legally incapacitated for the performance of certain acts; one who is under the authority of his parents or guardians, or who is not permitted by law to make contracts and manage his own property. Technically minor is a Scots law term, and when used in contradistinction to pupil signifies a person above the age of pupilarity (twelve in females, and fourteen in males) and under that of majority, which in both sexes is twenty-one years. The technical term in England is infant, but minor is used in the same sense in general literature. 'When the briar minor pants for twenty-one.' Pope. 2. In logic, the minor term, or the minor premise. See under the adjective.—3. In music, the minor key. See under the adjective.—4. A Minorite; a Franciscan friar.

2. The state of being a minor or not come of age, and therefore legally incapacitated for the performance of certain acts. See MINOR, n.—3. The period or interval before one is of full age, generally the period from birth until twenty-one years of age. In Scots law, the interval between pupilarity and majority. The minority of the sovereign in this country is understood to terminate at the age of eighteen years.—4. The smaller number out of a whole divided into two, as in a parliamentary division: opposed to majority. Thus we say, the minority was large; A. B. was in the minority; the minority must be ruled by the majority.

Minorship (mī'nor-ship), n. The state of being a minor.

Minotaur (min-ö-tar), n. [From Minos, an ancient Cretan lawgiver, and Gr. tauros, a bull, because the minotaur is said to have been the offspring of Pasiphaë, wife of Minos, and a bull. In Greek myth, a monster fabled to have had the body of a man, with the head of a bull, and to have fed on human flesh, on which account Minos shut him up in the labyrinth of Dædalus, and at first exposed to him criminals, but afterwards youths and maidens yearly sent from Athens as a tribute. He was slain by Theseus.]

Minster (min-stér), n. [A. Sax. mynster, a monastery, the church attached to a monastery (O. minster, D. monaster), from L. monasterium, a monastery. See MONASTERY.] Originally, a monastery; afterwards, the church of a monastery; a cathedral church. Both in Germany and England this title is given to several large cathedrals; as, York minster; the minster of Strasburg, &c. It is also found in the names of several places which owe their origin to a monastery; as, Westminster, Loominster, &c.

Or else were he, the holy king whose hymns
Are chanted in the minster, worse than all.

Tennyson.

Minstrel (min-strel), n. [O. Fr. menestrel, from L. L. ministrellus, a harper, a dim. from L. minister, a servant, attendant—properly one who ministered to the amusement of the rich by music or jesting.] A singer and musical performer on instruments. In the middle ages minstrels were a class of men who subsisted by the arts of poetry and music, and sang to the harp or other instrument verses composed by themselves or others. They also appear to have accompanied their songs with mimicry and action, and to have practised such various means of diverting as were admired in those rude times, and supplied the want of more refined entertainment. These arts rendered them extremely popular and acceptable in England and the neighbouring countries. The person of the minstrel was sacred; his profession was a passport; he was 'high placed in hall, a welcome guest;' no high scene of festivity was considered complete that was not set off with the exercise of the minstrel's talents. So long as the spirit of chivalry existed the minstrels were protected and caressed, because their songs tended to do honour to the ruling passion of the times, and to encourage a martial spirit. They afterwards sank to so low a level as to be classed, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, with beggars and vagabonds.

Minstrelsy (min-strel-ä), n. 1. Musical instruments used by minstrels.

For sorrow of which he broke his minstrelsy,
Both harp and lute, gittern and sawtry. Chaucer.

Miniver (min'-i-verb), n. [O. Fr. menuiser, menuisier, menuisier, a grayish fur—menuis (L. minutus), small, and ver, fur.] The Siberian squirrel, which has fine white fur; also the fur itself. Spelled also Miniver.

He lists not tell of ocher rare
Of marbles green, and braided hair,
And kirtles furred with miniver. Sir W. Scott.

Mink (mink), n. An American and European quadruped, allied to the polecat and weasel (Putorius Fison or Lutreola). It is semi-aquatic, burrowing on the banks of rivers and ponds, living on frogs, crayfishes, and fishes, which it pursues in the water. It exhales a strong odour of musk, and its fur is in considerable request. The European and American minks are by some regarded as distinct species. It is also called Minx and Minz-otter.

Minnesinger (min'-ne-sing-er), n. [O. G. minne, friendship, love, and singer, a singer.] One of a class of early German lyric poets and singers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, so called from love being the chief theme of their poems. The body was composed chiefly or exclusively of men of noble descent, comprising knights, nobles, princes, and even emperors. They sang their pieces to their own accompaniment on the viol, and often engaged in poetical contests for the gratification of princes and ladies of the court. Their songs are mostly in the Swabian dialect, which during the brilliant days of the house of Swabia was the court language of Germany. The most extensive collection of their songs was compiled by Rüdiger von Manesse, burgo-master of Zürich in the beginning of the fourteenth century, and consists of from 1400 to 1500 pieces. The minnesingers gave way to the mastersingers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. See MASTER-SINGER.

Minnie (min'-i), n. An infantine word for mother. [Scotch.]

Minnow (min'-ô), n. [Perhaps from Fr. minu (L. minutus), small, or shortened from such forms as Prov. E. minim, mennam, Sc. minnan, from L. minimus, smallest; in any case from a widely-spread root meaning small. See MINOR.] A species of cyprinoid fish, the Leuciscus phoxinus (Cuv.), and the smallest British species of that family. It inhabits fresh-water streams. In America the name is given to the Phoxinus lavia.

Hear you this Triton of the minnows! Shak.

Minor (mî'nor), a. [L. minor, smaller; without a positive, and serving as the comparative of parvus, small. From a root min, small, found in several of the Aryan tongues; comp. A. Sax. minian, to lessen; Dan. Sw. mindre, Icel. minnt, G. mindere, less; Ir. and Gael. min, small, fine; Gr. minythô, to lessen.] 1. Less; smaller: used relatively, and opposed to major; as, the minor portion of the inhabitants; the minor (as opposed to the major) axis of an ellipse; he also was guilty, but in a minor degree.

They altered this custom from cases of high concernment to the most trivial debates, the minor part ordinarily entering their protest. Clarendon.

2. Absolutely small; petty; unimportant; inconsiderable; not principal; as, minor faults; minor considerations; minor points in an argument. 'Petty errors and minor lapses.' Sir T. Browne.

'The suppression or subtle hinting of minor details.' Dr. Caird.—3. In music, less by a lesser semitone: a term used to distinguish the mode or key having a minor third above the tonic or key-note. It is also applied to all the diatonic intervals. The minor third comprises a tone and a semitone A, C; while the major third is composed of two whole tones C, E.—Minor key, in music, that key or arrangement of tones and semitones which is distinguished from the major key by having a minor third instead of a major third from the tonic or key-note. It is adapted to solemn and mournful subjects.—Minor term, in logic, the subject of the conclusion of a categorical syllogism.—Minor premise, that which contains the minor term.

Minor (mî'nor), n. 1. A person of either sex under age; one under a certain age, and thereby legally incapacitated for the performance of certain acts; one who is under the authority of his parents or guardians, or who is not permitted by law to make contracts and manage his own property. Technically minor is a Scots law term, and when used in contradistinction to pupil signifies a person above the age of pupillarity (twelve in females, and fourteen in males) and under that of majority, which in both sexes is twenty-one years. The technical term in England is infant, but minor is used in the same sense in general literature. 'When the brisk minor pants for twenty-one.' Pope. 2. In logic, the minor term, or the minor premise. See under the adjective.—3. In music, the minor key. See under the adjective.—4. A Minorite; a Franciscan friar.

Minorate (mî'nor-ât), v. t. To diminish. Glanville.

Minoration (mî-no-râ-shon), n. A lessening; diminution.

We hope the mercies of God will consider our degenerated integrity unto some minoration of our offences. Sir T. Browne.

Minorese (mî'nor-es), n. A female under age.

Minorite (mî'nor-it), n. A Franciscan friar. Minority (mî-no-rî-ti), n. [Fr. minorité, from L. minor. See MINOR.] 1. The state of being minor or smaller.

From this narrow time of gestation may ensue a minority, a smallness in the exclusion. Sir T. Browne.

2. The state of being a minor or not come of age, and therefore legally incapacitated for the performance of certain acts. See MINOR, n.—3. The period or interval before one is of full age, generally the period from birth until twenty-one years of age. In Scots law, the interval between pupillarity and majority. The minority of the sovereign in this country is understood to terminate at the age of eighteen years.—4. The smaller number out of a whole divided into two, as in a parliamentary division: opposed to majority. Thus we say, the minority was large; A. B. was in the minority; the minority must be ruled by the majority.

Minorship (mî'nor-ship), n. The state of being a minor.

Minotaur (min'-ô-tar), n. [From Minos, an ancient Cretan lawgiver, and Gr. tauros, a bull, because the minotaur is said to have been the offspring of Pasiphaë, wife of Minos, and a bull.] In Greek myth, a monster fabled to have had the body of a man, with the head of a bull, and to have fed on human flesh, on which account Minos shut him up in the labyrinth of Dædalus, and at first exposed to him criminals, but afterwards youths and maidens yearly sent from Athens as a tribute. He was slain by Theseus.

Minster (min'-stêr), n. [A. Sax. mynter, a monastery, the church attached to a monastery (G. minster, D. monster), from L. monasterium, a monastery. See MONASTERY.] Originally, a monastery; afterwards, the church of a monastery; a cathedral church. Both in Germany and England this title is given to several large cathedrals; as, York minster; the minster of Strasburg, &c. It is also found in the names of several places which owe their origin to a monastery; as, Westminster, Leominster, &c.

Or else were he, the holy king whose hymns
Are chanted in the minster, worse than all. Tennyson.

Minstrel (min'-strel), n. [O. Fr. menestrel, from L. L. ministrælus, a harper, a dim. from L. minister, a servant, attendant—properly one who ministered to the amusement of the rich by music or jesting.] A singer and musical performer on instruments. In the middle ages minstrels were a class of men who subsisted by the arts of poetry and music, and sang to the harp or other instrument verses composed by themselves or others. They also appear to have accompanied their songs with mimicry and action, and to have practised such various means of diverting as were admired in those rude times, and supplied the want of more refined entertainment. These arts rendered them extremely popular and acceptable in England and the neighbouring countries. The person of the minstrel was sacred; his profession was a passport; he was 'high placed in hall, a welcome guest; no high scene of festivity was considered complete that was not set off with the exercise of the minstrel's talents. So long as the spirit of chivalry existed the minstrels were protected and caressed, because their songs tended to do honour to the ruling passion of the times, and to encourage a martial spirit. They afterwards sank to so low a level as to be classed, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, with beggars and vagabonds.

Minstrelsy (min'-strel-si), n. 1. Musical instruments used by minstrels.

For sorrow of which he broke his minstrelsy,
Both harp and lute, gittern and sawtry. Chaucer.

2. The arts and occupation of minstrels; music; song, especially song accompanied by instruments.—3. A number of minstrels or musicians.

Lord William's foremost favourite he,
And chief of all his minstrelsy. Sir W. Scott.
Nodding their heads before her goes
The merry minstrelsy. Coleridge.

4. A body of songs, or of ballad poetry suited for singing; as, the minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.

Mint (mint), n. [O. E. mint, mynt, munet, A. Sax. mynet, money, coin, mynet-smiththe, a money-smithy, a mint, from L. moneta, the mint, money, coin, from Moneta, a surname of Juno, in whose temple at Rome money was coined, from monere, to remind; so also D. munt, G. münze, Dan. mynt, coin, are from the Latin. Money is from the same word, through the French.] 1. The place where money is coined by public authority. In Great Britain formerly there was a mint in almost every county; but the privilege of coining is now considered as a royal prerogative in this country, and as the prerogative of the sovereign power in other countries. The only mint now in Great Britain is on the Tower Hill, London. — Master of the Mint, an officer in the English administration who presided over the mint. The office has been abolished, the mint being under the direct control of the chancellor of the exchequer. — 2. Fig. a source of invention or fabrication.

Miocene (mī'ō-sēn), a. [Gr. miōn, less, and kainos, recent.] In geol. the name given by Sir Charles Lyell to a subdivision of the tertiary strata. According to him the European tertiary strata may be referred to four successive epochs, each characterized by containing a very different proportion of fossil shells. The first or oldest he terms eoocene, the second miocene, the third older pliocene, and the last or fourth neocene pliocene. The terms miocene and pliocene are comparative, the first meaning less recent, and the other more recent; they express the more or less near approach which the deposits of these eras, when contrasted with each other, make to the existing creation, at least so far as the mollusca are concerned. The miocene period was found to yield 18 per cent of recent fossils; many shells belong exclusively to this period. The miocene strata contain an admixture of the extinct genera of lacustrine mammalia of the eoocene series, with the earliest forms of genera which exist at the present time. The statistical test is no longer applicable, but the term is still used for those strata which overlie the eoocene. Spelled also Melocene.

Miocene (mī'ō-sēn), n. In geol. the miocene strata.

Miohippus (mī'ō-hip'pus), n. [Mio, from miocene, and Gr. hippos, a horse.] A fossil genus of pachyderms, family Equidae, occurring in the miocene strata of North America, in which each forefoot consists of three toes, the middle one being the largest. The miohippus was about the size of a sheep.

Miocene (mī'ō-sēn), a. [Gr. miōn, less, and kainos, recent.] In geol. the name given by Sir Charles Lyell to a subdivision of the tertiary strata. According to him the European tertiary strata may be referred to four successive epochs, each characterized by containing a very different proportion of fossil shells. The first or oldest he terms eoene, the second miocene, the third older pliocene, and the last or fourth newer pliocene. The terms miocene and pliocene are comparative, the first meaning less recent, and the other more recent; they express the more or less near approach which the deposits of these eras, when contrasted with each other, make to the existing creation, at least so far as the mollusca are concerned. The miocene period was found to yield 18 per cent of recent fossils; many shells belong exclusively to this period. The miocene strata contain an admixture of the extinct genera of lacustrine mammals of the eoene series, with the earliest forms of genera which exist at the present time. The statistical test is no longer applicable, but the term is still used for those strata which overlie the eoene. Spelled also Meiocene.
